THE SAVAGE 650

Beauty and the beach.

By 5:05 Matt had finished work.

By 5:20 he was at the dealership picking up the keys. He rolled his new Savage onto the street. He swung a leg over and settled in behind the teardrop tank.

Matt pushed the electric start and the single cylinder, four stroke engine rumbled awake. Here was power in his hands. And the beat of a crisp, throaty exhaust note.

He had two takes before this one but this was his first new motorcycle. And the great thing about it was it hadn't cost him his life savings.

First stop was Donna's place. Matt accelerated up the street, the hard pulling torque pushing him to the back of the seat.

Donna was waiting on the porch when he pulled up. Matt sat perfectly balanced, barely 26 inches from the ground. Donna climbed on board. He gave the throttle a twist and off they shot into the twilight.

headed for the beach, where friends get together talking about anything and everything. Tonight it was who might get a ride on Matt's new Savage.

He and Donna got off the bike and Matt couldn't help but like what he saw: his Savage 650 loaded with chrome. Chrome spokes, headlight and fender rails. Chrome battery cover, shocks, and mirrors. He smiled. The ocean sand and his Savage looked great together.

Beauty and the beach.

I can't believe I got all this bike for just $2,299.*

The Swaggart Bop

I'd like to say how much I enjoyed your article about Reverend Swaggart. As a spiritual minister, a southerner, and a local Boston rock personality, it warms my heart to see in print anyone exposing the increasingly fading understanding of the "born again" Christian movement. The whole thing is a scam based on the "high" that one gets from power, the pulpit, and money—the greatest thrust these whorers know. If one would consider the bloodshed and extortion that seem to underline the history of humanity in the name of so-called religious beliefs, we truly know where "Satan" hangs out. No one person can tell anyone how to find spiritual truth. Rock 'n' roll lyrics are but a reflection of the present corruptions of society.

Rev. Terrie Komar
Barn, MA

As the publisher of an up-and-coming heavy metal publication, I am quite concerned over the ongoing charades of Bible-wielding fanatics such as Jimmy Swaggart, Jerry Falwell, and the like. I strongly believe in freedom of the press and the freedom of one to say as I know how to spell it, but he knows he doesn't like it. TV star Jimmy Swaggart taking apocryphal every-on in the dictionary and one that isn't to buy and read what one wants. I know that my publication in no way reflects any thoughts of evil or anything similar to that on any member of today's youth. I'd like to protect my future as a publisher as well as the futures of all the great heavy metal and hard rock bands who are just trying to earn a living the best way they know how and are using the talents God gave them as musicians to secure a happy and financially secure life-style. I believe that is also known as striving for the "American Dream."

Anne-Ken
Publisher of Hard Rocks
Monticello, NJ

Like most things that threaten the basic fabric of our society, the call for censorship has been met with apathy and a misunderstanding of what it could mean to each of us personally. The temptation to ignore Swaggart and company is great. But in a political climate in which the President can get away with joking about nuking the Soviets, the politically absurd cannot be taken lightly. It falls to the rock 'n' roll community to take to the forefront of an important issue. True, what we as individuals choose to listen to should not, logically, be an issue of national concern. But there it is, and the ramifications make it essential that we take up the struggle.

Ruby Lee
New York, NY

Dear Jimmy Swaggart:
It was an act of courage for SPIN to interview you. Your ideas of American ideals are misplaced and an insult to the men who created this country. I'll defend to the death your right to preach your views, but I will fight forever your attempt to censor me. I am not overcome with Satan. I just don't agree with you.

Philip Harley

A Geek in the Senate

I don't appreciate the way John Trudeau, in his review of Cum Slay by the Screaming Blue Messiahs, refers to Peter Garrett of Midnight Oil as a "geek." Any man who can come close to election in the Australian Senate on a nuclear disarmament party ticket and can create music with a sincere and motivating message in today's world of shallow pop ballad can hardly be referred to as a geek.

Jeff Calvert
London, Ontario

Pope Joe

I enjoyed and agreed with John Leland's review of Joe Strummer's latest effort and the update on the Clash/Big Audio Dynamite soap opera (Singles, November). Jones and Strummer are no longer Sandinistas; they are Contras. I don't know why I should be surprised. Dylan loved God. Jerry Rubin loved Wall Street. Edridge Cleaver became a conservative ordained minister. It is sad that one of the most influential bands of the '70s and '80s has lost touch with where they came from and the people who are still stuck there. I'm sick and tired of listening to Joe Strummer pontificate his ex-evangelist-straight morality about why I shouldn't smoke pot. Where were they for Live Aid? Where were they for Amnesty International? Where were they for Artists Against Apartheid?

Eric Rice

The billing question

I would like to congratulate Robert Keating on a beautifully written article, Atlanta, Who Murdered Your Children? (October). I've lived in Atlanta for the past six years, moved here at the height of the event. A good friend of my father was an FBI agent who worked on parts of the case and has convinced me that Wayne Williams took part in the two killings. Now that's only two, what about the others? How can a pedophile system worthy of our respect just clone a case and destroy evidence—evidence that could easily end several others? I don't understand!

M. Spivey
Atlanta, GA

House Affair

As a Chicago musician and songwriter, it was gratifying to see your article on Chicago's home music scene ("Burning Down the House," November). "House" has brought some much needed international attention to the local music scene. Our writers and players have always been on the cutting edge, but are handicapped by the local music business scene, a hopelessly inept and backwards for a city this size. Until now. The irony, however, is that the musicians here have been "paying dues" for years, while a bunch of young upstart CDs are getting the record deal. I'm throwing away my old theory books, and "jumping house."

Steven Pratt
Chicago, IL

At first your magazine was great. The letters section was disorganized. The articles had a hint to them that you didn't read very often. And the back page always had something incredibly interesting on it. Something important. But now your letters are serious and all arranged under sub-heads, and there isn't a single caustic remark to be found. Loosen up, get off the highway, and onto some more back roads. I just miss the messy magazine you used to be.

Christina Pelech
Riverside, NC

Indignant response: SPIN interview. Ren & Ruben on the back page of this issue caught our guard in their CIGB matching bikini outfits. Your letter didn't deserve a neat and clever sub-head, all the mess you can handle can be found on the fourth floor at 7945 Broadway (and that's just the staff), and in our wit and wit a reader, read SPIN's December interview with Jimmy Swaggart.

SURF NAZIS

Zodiac Mindwarp and the Love
Reaction Make Sperm Obsolete.

Who are Zodiac Mindwarp and the Love Reaction and what do they mean?

The first half is simple.

A four-color collective from northern England, they're: self-proclaimed acid sexuality and comic book fan Zodiac Mindwarp on vocals and fake American accent; Cobalt Stargazer on lead guitar; Kid Chaos on bass; Slam Thunderbolt on drums; and Evil Bastard (reportedly receiving psychiatric treatment, but aren't we all?) on keyboards.

Mr. Warp and Co. are this year's Now People, thanks to yet another psychedelic revival in London. Or perhaps, like Phil Collins, it just never went away. Doctor and the Medics spearheaded the latest incarnation by reaching the UK No. 1 spot with their version of "Spelt in the Sky"; and Zodiac rode in on the reverberative ludes. Their surf Nazi garb is leather, leather, chains, leather, and at least one painted tin helmet. "Our roads brought it back from the Falklands after shooting an Argentine," Warp laid to one writer.

It's not just the music. Nightclubs like Alice in Wonderland and the Ark are playing Grateful Dead records and booking bands like Gay Bikers on Acid. Shops like Planet Alice offer a cosmic range of incense, beads, pendants, cuffens, crushed velvet flares, and overpriced Strawberry Alarm Clock records. Syd Barrett fanzines vanish as quickly as they appear.

Mindwarp music is herd sludge with a psychedelic backdrop and a dollop of Motorhead, with whom they recently toured. Lyrics are suitably sun-catching. "I'm the high priest of love'm shooting babies from the end of my dick This ain't science, honey, this is magic."

So what does it mean? In real life Zodiac Mindwarp is Mark Manning, a former cartoonist who likes poetry and net galleries. "I've a theory," he said recently, "that all creative acts—whether they're painting, writing music, anything—are conducted in a state of madness, which is basically the unconscious mind unleashed. That's what Zodiac is."

BRIGHT LIGHTS, BIG CODPIECE

John Sex Flaunts his Talent in Two Very Tacky Videos.

You're having one of those days, and it's time for a pick-me-up. And watching yuppies stuff ferrets down their pants won't do (unless the ferrets take a mouthful).

What you want is sex. More specifically, you want Sex. Not a little Sex, either. You want a lotta Sex.

A lotta Sex is exactly what you get in John Sex's new videos, "Bump and Grind It" and "Hustle with My Muscle," both shot and carefully directed by Tom Rubnitz, who made "The Drag Queen Marathon" filmed on Mother's Day 1985.

Rubnitz lives in a multilevel left among dolls, a flowered wastebasket, an original Fil Fil hawk, and Yardley "Twigg" eyeliner, and is our answer to John Waters—but without the mustache. Sex is divine, but I don't mean Divine.

In "Hustle with My Muscle," Sex is pursued in and out of bars, cars, stages, just about anywhere and everywhere, cuz these girls can't get snuff.

Hustle with the muscle

Hustle with the muscle

Can you hustle the man below my belt

Hustle with the muscle

Hustle with the muscle

Girls I've got the most I think you've ever felt Cut to: shot of a python (Sex's pet Delilah, Cut to Delilah wrapping herself around Sex. Cut back to: salivating women. A shot of Sex's crotch. Cut to: breastwurst on a plate.

Woman's voice: "Now I know why they call you the ruler."

Sex even plays what looks like a gold lame Randy Rhoads guitar. Cool.

He's prettier than Boy George over was and has a better body. Besides, the guy is funny. And he's got really big . . . hair.

"If you read my mind, act on it," he offers, "to complete your satisfaction. . . ."

Well, all the girls look and without something asexual do.

Nobody's going to call John Sex the Next Big Thing.

But he's got one. Or it's one hell of a sock collection, folks.

TALKING DREAMS

DUKE BOOTEE, COWRITER OF "THE MESSAGE," COMPARES LOCKS WITH MUTUBARUKA.

Mutubaruka stands transfixed, eyes closed, a shock of white hair separating his dreadlocks above his sweat-drenched brow, singing, talking. Part of the unbroken line of griots and poets that call back our untidy past.

First and foremost, Mutubaruka is a poet. He has been writing and publishing since the late '60s and credits the civil rights movement of that period as one of his main influences.

Mutubaruka performs with his eyes closed; he doesn't dance for the audience. When I asked what American artists he liked, he replied, "Ella Fitzgerald, Curtis Mayfield, Chuck Jackson, Al Jareau, and Stevie Wonder." He laughed when I told him they all perform with their eyes closed as well.

With locks trailing down the middle of my back, I feel like those hip white boys must feel—you know the type, the ones who have adapted black music or some part of black culture. I had to ask: What do you think of American brothers like myself, born and raised here, who have learned about the Rastafarian culture and adopted some of the ways?

Mutubaruka speaks calmly, in a low register. "I don't say I'm adopting. It's like a lot of reggae artists are influenced by American acts; Chuck Jackson, Curtis Mayfield, and all that have been a long time back. You know something like Rasta is come up rising out of Jamaica, but it is everywhere now. I can't see that as adopting. A black man cannot adopt another black man's thing. He can adopt a red Indian thing, or a Chaldean thing, or a white man thing, but him can't adopt his own thing. I see that as black people influencing black people."

Twenty years ago, people like Miles, Charles Lloyd, and John Coltrane gave me my mind. Mutubaruka and his reggae brethren have given me back my body.

—Duke Bootee

The Georgia
Satellites Practice
George Jones
Covers for the Judgment Day

HELL ON SKATES

The Georgia Satellites want to sound like the devil on roller skates. They like to play loud, and they have the stacks of Marshalls to do so. They even play their Neil Young records loud, not just "Rust Never Sleeps," but also mellow stuff like "Old Man." They wake each other up to play their new Faces bootlegs.

They claim they're from hell (in a bucket) but they really mean Atlanta. Rick Price and Mauro Magellan used to play in a band called the Brains. Just as they were getting nationally famous, and before Cyndi Lauper could record their "Money Changes Everything," they broke up. Price and Magellan joined Rick Richards and Dan Baird in the Satellites. They added the Georgia when they put out an EP in Britain, and the Satellites from England bummed out. Hame turt, after all.

The Georgia Satellites are from Georgia, but they don't sound like the Altman Brothers or R.E.M. Rick Price likes R.E.M., but is miffed that Mike Mills said R.E.M. blew the Brains away at R.E.M.'s first gig. Rick wants to speak to Mike Mills. Texas death match. Blood feud. Thrilla in Manila. Fifteen rounds, no hitting below the belt.

The Satellites sound like very old Slanes, and they like that. Their guitars sound dirty, like they're playing with sand in their teeth. Their songs have about three chords, maybe four, but that's all they need. They could be the next ZZ Top if they hired a marketing genius. On good nights they sound like a stack car race. Their music is great straight, but it's a lot more comfortable with a couple at Rolling Rocks under your belt.

The Satellites are demonic onstage, mellow in person. Rick Price wants to open Rick's Rod and Salad Bar—auto repair with veggies. Rick Richards wants to buy New Zealand. Dan Baird has no idea what he wants to do. Maura Magellan wants to open up a nursery or transcendental meditation center. Better yet, best of all, get one of those Isaltian tanks and fill it with wheels, curtains, some little portholes, a cosmic camper.

All at the Georgia Satellites like kung fu movies, and they say, any movie in which Edward G. Robinson says, "Yander lies the castle of my tad-doh" (even though it was really Tony Curtis who said it). They like George Jones, and cover "The Race Is On" and "White Lightning" in their live show. And whatever else comes into their heads. Sometimes one thinks up a really cool cover, tears into it, and lets the others figure it out as they go.

If you had to pick one band for a year on a desert island, it wouldn't be the Georgia Satellites. But if you could pick a house band for your never-ending party in hell, they'd be the one. They'd probably like it too. Free beer. A hot crowd. Smoking Marshall cabinets. And the devil roller skating around in time to the music.

—Chris Carroll

WHITE TRASH

Tav Falco and Panther Burns Dig Ditches for Soap Suds and Turds.

"The Panther Burns, thinking of themselves as the ditchdiggers of American music, have, I think, found the right place to live and work," says group founder Tav Falco. That place is Memphis, the city that introduced rock & roll to white America and was as far north as many Delta bluesmen ever got. "We're picking up on the sugar-grip mentality down here the idea of living in a real natural way. We're on the edge of a sugar dish with Panther Burns, and we're about to fall in."

No shit. "Sugar Dish Revisited" was the first of two Panther Burns EPs released on the French New Rose label this year. It marked the return to vinyl after nearly half a decade of America's finest rank-and-heel roots band.

No shit. When Panther Burns splattered on the national scene five years ago, it was with an unbridled male of bluesy sound. Ditchdiggers, not like the Cramps' growldiggers, nor like Stray Cats' diggers into male miscegeny. Ditches, Ditches for suds and turds. The authentic sound of the Delta blues on vinyl and still coming. Falco must be content, only unless you count the ferocious independence of Falco's voice and the best, or the twisted caricatures of Scotty Moore licks. The group's echoes were as resolutely crispy as the Johnny Burnette Trio's. Influential beyond their record sales, Panther Burns live! Falco with an unsteadily supporting cast! watched from the shadows as roots rock elevated itself into beer commercials. Panther Burns' says Falco, is simply not equipped aesthetically or otherwise to go in certain commercial directions that are popular today.

No shit. There is no money in this, man, Falco says with resignation. An Arkansas blues debate who originally moved to Memphis to document the Delta blues on vinyl and still coming. Falco must be content, only unless you count the ferocious independence of Falco's voice and the best, or the twisted caricatures of Scotty Moore licks. The group's echoes were as resolutely crispy as the Johnny Burnette Trio's. Influential beyond their record sales, Panther Burns live! Falco with an unsteadily supporting cast! watched from the shadows as roots rock elevated itself into beer commercials. Panther Burns' says Falco, is simply not equipped aesthetically or otherwise to go in certain commercial directions that are popular today.

Club owners should be alerted to the fact that Panther Burns feel more comfortable in a cotton life with a noisier light bulb just blowing it out in a real casual way with friends playing the kind of music that makes you want to drag your partner across the floor.

It is not inconceivable to picture Falco whiling away his time at the dog track and shuffleboard palaces one day, the way another of the town's neglected personae the silver-haired rockabilly like Charlie Feathers spends his days. But it won't be without a fight.

The Shop Assistants and the Archies Have Never Been Seen Together.

One of the lasting fetters of the English rock press is the need to create new movements in rock. The latest bands to fall prey to this are a clutch of young independent groups banded with the rubric of Protest Rock: London's Midway, Coventry's Mighty Lemon Drops, and a band from Edinburgh called the Shop Assistants. Like, forget teen music, we're going further back here: last cars and beer are out, candy and holding hands in class are in. Despite mixing this steepness with Roseanne throb, the Shop Assistants appear in the English press as a band that would make the Archies look like Black Flag. Admittedly, remaining their singer, Alex, of this situation does provoke a youthful response. She screams. And the band's guitarist, quiet young David, looks thoughtfully at his knees while drummer Laura pretends not to have heard and bassist Sarah merely asserts. The Shop Assistants are united in their displeasure. It seems that everything they do is contrived and hard work. This is given up there like singing to a major (Blue Oyster, the new Rough Trade/Chrislay link-up) is seen as a sell-out.

This vexes them also. "It's just this country," David tells his fans. "Nobody gets worried if Mashed Da sign to a major in America. I mean, if you've got a friend who works for the civil service or something, you don't ask them how they make their money."

"I do," says Sarah. This dissenting voice aside, the Shop Assistants are stunningly unconcerned about their big new record deal. Alex is more interested in trying to get people to guess her age (22), but does say, "I don't actually know if we'll be going long enough to worry about our music changing, you know I don't even know if I'd like the Shop Assistants if I wasn't one."

David is much more put punk on. "I thank our LP's great," he says. "I feel to it all the time."

The LP Cheap and Mean, besides from David and Alex's central disagreements. While Alex displays a tenderness for GAW and Overy Springfield, David spends his days fighting out condescending Roseanne comparisons. "It's just that it's playing itself here we're recording something and I can hear things going on, subtle stuff and it's been lost when the record comes out."

He's right. The Shop Assistants' songs sometimes create a weird sort of homonym, a medical drone that's hidden in the music. They are a little like a reasonable Jesus and Mary Chain, a comparison they don't mind. Like that band, they've lowered simple thrash at times. And also like that band, they are capable of better. Right now, the Shop Assistants are young, they have made some good records and a couple of splendid ones. Their future promises them, however, and there will come a day when no one will ever compare them to what sort of rock cream they like best. In time, even Alex will like the Shop Assistants.

LOW LIFE

Howard Chaykin Gets Knee-Deep in Funk in *Time*².

Howard Chaykin thinks maybe he's in the wrong business. "I don't know," he says grimly. "But I just can't adjust my sensibilities to reach an audience interested in guys running around in masks, gnashing their fangs, and saving the poor from themselves."

After making his living as a comic-book artist for nine years, Chaykin walked away in disgust in 1979. He came back in 1983 with American Fleg! (First Comics), a beautifully composed pastiche of ballsy dames in black getter balls, rampaging political action committees, and a Iona Chendiarlen Tidy-Bowl Men paddling against a whirlstream of moral corruption. The 26 monthly issues of Fleg! that Chaykin produced were an exhilaratingly profane tour de force, perhaps the most coherent work ever produced in the disreputable four-color comics format. Chaykin's latest project is a graphic novel

(read: big comic) called *Time*² (First Comics again), which he immediately describes as what you would get "if Damon Runyon and Philip K. Dick were to collaborate on a prime-time soap, with music by Bud Powell and Charlie Parker." Howard was a pioneer of the "graphic novel" (he hates the term) with his adaptation of Alfred Easton's classic science-fiction novel The Stars My Destination in 1978, but *Time*²—sleek to be the first of at least three semi-annual books—is in a class by itself: a disyllably rhythmic narrative set in a dream landscape of nightclubbing lowlifes, where "everyone is either a jazz musician or a thug. It's a fun book," he says, "the kind that makes your mother say, 'let's call Jimmy Swaggart.'"

The world of *Time*², as Chaykin describes it, is built out of "my fantasies and scorned memories of New York in the late '40s, the milieu that my parents moved in—my mother was a second-rate band singer in Brooklyn—which seemed very romantic to me as a child. And it still does, really—the sense of design of the time, the clothing, the music, is all very captivating."

Chaykin's other big project is a three-issue revival of the Blackhawks for DC Comics (in the same format as the Dark Knight resuscitation of Selmen last year), which he hopes to have in the stores next spring. Basically it's just another excuse for him to draw guys in suit suits. Chaykin's Blackhawks will return the Nazi-fighting air-team to their '40s roots.

So why does Howard Chaykin write and draw comics? The boy himself doesn't really have a good answer. By way of explanation he ventures, "I like the form, but I don't have a helluva lot of respect for the content."

"Robert Palmer was on TV," says Mick Glaisher, drummer of the C.S. Angels, "and he was asked what he was listening to. And he mentioned our album, so we thought we'd ring him up to say thank you. And we told him we weren't very happy with the situation with our record company, and he asked us how we'd like to be on Island."

Rock 'n' roll fairy tales, don't you just love them? There were the C.S. Angels, the English band nobody seemed to love anymore and all of a sudden a bona fide Famous Person comes along and offers them a record contract. Unsurprisingly, they took him up on his offer and are once again among us with a shiny new record. It's called Chasing the Shadows, and they are very happy with it. They even let Palmer do a bit of singing on it.

The Angels originally emerged in the late '70s, and were promptly compared to Echo and the Bunnymen and U2. But they lacked the up-front images of those bands. So while others went on to megafame, the C.S. Angels just kept making acceptable records that no one bought. Then they jumped to the small Jive label, known in the UK for pop acts like Billy Ocean and topless model Samantha Fox. Jive wanted chart action. "The idea was to make pop singles," says Steven Fellows. "We got bored with making the strange records and getting rave reviews and nothing else, so we decided to have a go at selling out. But now we're back again peddling the old stuff."

Sitting in the front room at Glaisher's house in Sheffield, the Angels feel much more comfortable about themselves now that they've abandoned the cynical and pathetically wrong quest for hits. "With Chasing the Shadows," says Glaisher, "we've got the opportunity to purge ourselves of the dishonesty we felt about our careers and our music. We wrote and recorded it very quickly to get some of the energy back into the music that had been lacking."

"I see it in practical terms. The bands I used to listen to a lot were bands I could see myself being involved with, visually and in the number of people in the band. I saw Television, they played for an hour and they just stood there, and I thought they were wonderful. Those early images stay with me, and I get pissed off when outsiders try to change it. Like when Jive tried to make us into a Top 10 band."

So now the C.S. Angels are on Island, and they have an album they produced essentially by themselves. It's a nice, low-key affair that should win them new friends and bring a few old ones back again. Which is how the best fairy tales end, isn't it?

—David Quantick

at the Partyline off fall line

So begins David & David's down-home album being "A Rock for the Forgotten," one of nine sides of life on Boomerang, the pair's debut album. The Partyline is, in fact, a ramshackle bar a few doors south of Hollywood and Vine; it remains a favorite watering hole of the Somers Doves, as David & David briefly consider calling themselves.

At the Partyline, instrumentalist-realist David Ricketts is working on a Greyhound, while singer-lyricist David Barlowd stores merrily of his shot glass of bourbon and Bud pony chaser. And blither: "This is a message to the smokers at SPIN," he laments. "That hip can sometimes be spelled with a 'y' on it hypnotized," as in "Tiger"—either way it's bullshit. And if you're looking for that, you're looking for nothing.

He brightens suddenly. "You're not running an expense account on this thing, are you?" Staring my head, I place one of the two fens in my possession on the bar and order a Corona. "Oh, borkenp," Barlowd shouts, "can I have another one of these?" Barlowd admits to having received one joyfully check so far—for 27C—from the soundtrack of the film Echo Park. Ricketts did the score and the parties did a song.

No wonder: there is no blither. Ricketts "I need SPIN seriously, and the thing I was concentrating on was all such negative shit—impugning somebody's very nature because they make music."

"Exactly," Barlowd agrees. "Fuck you, man—why don't you try it?"

Ricketts rushes to this heelender's aid. "Well, you got glasses, but otherwise you don't look like this Castle."

"I know I'm losing all this too personally," Barlowd admits. "What it has to do with is a state of mind that I grew up with as a club musician in Los Angeles. It played me off then and it continues to play me off. Because I see good people 'throw' themselves away because they're vulnerable, because they can't get past all the stuff."

"Everybody's operating on the lean principle—everybody," says Ricketts. "I see the whole thing as one giant defense mechanism. You gotta be cool. 'What the fuck is cool?' God is asking God so that nobody sees what's really going on. We're all vulnerable, we're all scared shits—even if we wear black all the time and get pissed and smoke a thousand cigarettes a day." (Barlowd is smoking nine of the moment.) "You pack up the L.A. Times—this guy is hip, that guy is hip. It kinda goes my work."

"Hip H-Y-R?" Barlowd reminds us. He watches me pull out my wallet. "Hey, you got another ten bucks—awright."

Ricketts and I switch to Bloddy Morris; Barlowd sticks with bolshemakers. Ricketts leads close. "I swear to God, we're just like... completely... 'Rascal,'" he confides with a self-deprecating laugh. "Well, it's true. We both have like a million things wackin' on us, and that's what comes up. And we always wanna do a good job. We do what we do, and that's all we're ever gonna do."

Ricketts gives me a sincere look. "Hey, can I get some coin nuts?" —David Scappo

Put this in your Casio and play it.

The SK-1 Digital Sampler.

You're looking at the keyboard that will unlock a new era in creativity—a polyphonic digital sampling machine that costs hundreds less than anything comparable. As you might expect, it's a product of Casio technology.

Whatever your ears can hear, Casio's new SK-1 can reproduce. Simply by directing its built-in microphone at the sound you want to capture, you can record a sample of it. Then play it back, loop it or change it using any of 13 different sound envelopes.

Besides the sounds you put into it, the SK-1 abounds in presets—piano, brass ensemble, trumpet, synth drum, human voice—all astonishing in their clarity and fidelity because they're PCM samples taken straight from the instruments.

And there's more to its repertoire. Including auto rhythms, one-finger chords and built-in vibrato and portamento effects. Plus a memory that lets you store melodies and chords up to 400 steps, using sampled tones, presets and synthesized harmonics. There are also external mike and line level inputs for improved sampling fidelity.

You get out of music what you put into it. With Casio's new SK-1, the only limit to what you can put into it is your own imagination. And that's straight from the horse's mouth.

David McCollum/Williams

The wrongful-death suit, dismissed last August, that charged Ozzy Osbourne and CBS Records with instigating a 39-year-old California man to commit suicide is expected to be retried this month in a Los Angeles County court. It alleges that a 28-second instrumental interval on the song "Suicide Solution" contains "modified" lyrics that induced John McCollum of Indio, California, to kill himself in October of 1984.

According to the suit, the following six lines, though sung at one-and-one-half times the normal rate of speech and not immediately intelligible, can be discerned beneath the instrumental section of the song:

*Am I know people
You really know where it's at
You got it
Why try, why try
Get the gun and try it
Shoot, shoot, shoot [repeated for about 10 seconds]*

The case against Osbourne and CBS was originally filed in the fall of 1985, but was thrown out when the parents of John McCollum were unable to bring their complaint to state sufficiently any connection between "Suicide Solution" and their son's death. The McCollums were granted 60 days to produce evidence of subliminal messages in the song. To build their case, they hired Steve Williamson of the Institute for Bio-Acoustic Research, a private company that studies the psychological and physiological effects of sound, to study Osbourne's music, backward and forward—literally.

Williamson says that not all the words on "Suicide Solution" were immediately intelligible on the master recording. To verify the unclear lyrics, he used a version of the song that appeared on a different live recording, the concert video The Ultimate Ozzy, which was recorded a year and a half after McCollum's death. On that version, Williamson claims, he could clearly hear the lyrics

The suit further alleges that McCollum shot himself while wearing headphones and listening to the final side on a different Ozzy album, Speak of the Devil, used, according to Thomas T. Anderson, attorney for the McCollum family, the song John McCollum was listening to when he shot himself was "probably 'Platinum,' because that is the last song on the record that was on the turntable." McCollum's body wasn't discovered until the next day, however, which made it impossible to determine which of the album side's four songs he was listening to—if any—when he put a gun to his head and pulled the trigger.

The suit also notes that Riverside County Deputy Coroner Lee Seefeltz stated in his autopsy report that McCollum "committed suicide by shooting self in head with .22 caliber pistol while listening to devil music." A spokesman from the coroner's office verified the wording of the autopsy report, but Seefeltz was unavailable for comment as to forensic methods used to determine physical effects of devil music on the suicide victim.

According to Williamson, several hundred hours of listening time and the use of a myriad of technological advancements uncovered the subliminal lyrics and a Hemisync tone, an extremely low-frequency tone that, researchers say, produces relaxation and assists listeners in processing information. Subliminal messages, says Williamson, are most effective when they are used to reinforce one's own desires. They work by bypassing the conscious mind and avoiding critical acceptance or rejection of the information.

Though he does not know of any research indicating that subliminal messages can create new desires in a person, he added, such an effect might be possible with extensive prolonged exposure.

Williamson said that the last line of the six-line passage in "Suicide Solution"—which the suit contends repeats the word "shoot" for 10 seconds—changes to "su, su, su" repeated for several seconds, which he interprets as the final syllable of the word suicide.

Responding to questions about the reliability of his scientific method, Williamson did not explain how his audio research determined the difference between the alleged lyrics "know" and his actual engaged? "No... and when asked about it said, 'I hadn't noticed [he 'know' spelling in the court papers]. It must be a typo.'"

According to Williamson, backward-staking—the recording of words intended to be revealed when the record is played backward—does not have any effect on the listener and should not be taken seriously.

He said the words "why try" were found at the end of one of the songs on the album Blood of Oz, when it was played backward. But, Williamson explained, the pronunciation patterns of certain words and phrases in the English language, when played in reverse can unintentionally produce other words or phrases.

Meanwhile, Sharon Osbourne, Ozzy's wife and personal manager, said she was "stunned and angered" by the new allegations. "It's a blatant, out-and-out lie. It's a total fabrication. It does not exist and that's it. What do they honestly think we do? Sit around a bubble-pot and conjure up all these things? They're insane."

Of the McCollum's lawyer, Osbourne said, "I think he's got a personal vendetta against my husband. That's the way I feel about it. I think it's nothing more than that. I think he's some nice little guy from Indio and he's just trying to make a name for himself on the back of Ozzy."

But what of the allegations? Are there really masked lyrics and subliminal suggestions hidden in the grooves? "Absolutely not. But I would love to meet the person that has discovered this, because he must have an incredible mind and an incredible set of ears."

"No matter what people think about Ozzy, we lead a normal life here. It has brought a great deal of upset to our household. Let me tell you. No matter what people may think of me husband, he does have a mother—she does read live messages."

After numerous calls, Ozzy's record label, CBS, declined to comment about the case. Attorneys for CBS could not be reached for comment.

Grace Jones
Inside Story
Manhattan Records

People think of Grace Jones as a disco queen. People think of her as Conan the Barbarian's sidekick. As just another Jones Bond villainess. As a major influence on the world of sunglasses. As a capo between Sonny Liston and Judy Garland.

To some people Grace's greatest contribution was combining the art of hair cutting with the art of soprano, or representational hedge trimming. To some people Grace Jones is the singer who bumped off Ethel Herrera.

To me Grace Jones is all of these and more. But she's also a musician. A very smart, very influential, and very artistic musician. She might not be a natural musician, but she's a natural in general. She may have started off taking it, but if you take it well enough and long enough, you can transform it into the real thing. And Grace has always been smart enough to have the smartest people around her. When she began working with producer Chris Blackwell and Alex Siddlein and with the Compass Point band—Sly Dunbar, Robbie Shakespeare, Barry Reynolds, Michael Chung, Wally Badarou, and Sticky Thompson—she was actually creating a new new wave, blending reggae, funk, disco, house culture, Kabuki, publicity, and an arboreal jungle worldview.

Under the direction of art director Jean Paul Goude, Grace Jones also made the first great rock videos—real spectacles that showed that visual song promotion and cinematic art could coexist.

Her last record, Slave to the Rhythm, was probably the first album-length remix of a single song. Titled "a biography," it was produced by Trevor Horn, assisted by the Art of Noise boys. It continued Grace's direction of beach dance music, and it reached new heights of lyrical sonic extravagance. It was sort of an opera of reggae, an extraordinary manifesto of sensual solipsism. It made Otello, Marlon's Advertisements for Myself, and Whitman's "Song of Myself" seem like modest efforts, or efforts of modesty. But it was somehow charming. And its vanity was almost humorously transcendental. It was Grace's schtick taken to the next plateau. Remember, she already had made albums titled Fame and Legend.

Anyway, in the course of making Slave, Grace began writing songs with Bruce Woolley, who cowrote Slave and played keyboards and guitar. And out of that collaboration came the songs for her new album, Inside Story.

Inside Story is another new direction. Compared to Slave it is positively Buddhist in its "contained-ness" and modesty. It consists of real songs—songs with catchy melodies, contagious rhythms, and good story lines. And for the first time, Grace cowrote all the songs. They're her stories. Sometimes they're a little mean, sometimes they're a little arch, but they're no bullshit.

Inside Story was produced by Nile Rodgers. "So was everything," you might say. But Nile seems to have been interested in the job this time, and he's added a lot more than the polish he's so proficient at providing. It's probably the best stuff he's done since Chic. He did have superior songs to work with, but there's nothing automatic about the way these songs are put together. Grace's start-from-scratch wildness seems to have inspired her collaborators, and the result is a seamless, excellent, partly melodicrama record. You can dance to it, and you can act really dramatic to it and jump up on your forefence table and do the hustle, the cool jerk, and the sacred steps of Watutsi.

Apparently Grace had two main strategies here. One was to write a story about something she knew about. The title track, "Inside Story," is about her brother being fired as church organist when they were kids because he was too swifty for the church elders. Grace's other strategy was a musical one. She wanted to mix things up rhythmically, and most of these songs shift gears at least once—from the Paris beat to Africa, or from China to Chino-Latino.

Another sinking thought about this album is that Grace really sings. On her early albums she often seemed to be on a search-and-destroy mission for the note. Now she sings with ease. She'll never be Sarah Vaughan, but she has learned that just because you can't be a great singer doesn't mean you can't be a great vocalist. Grace is a great vocalist. She has gravitone and inflection. She knows how to be breathy, lushed, and suggestive. She knows how to snarl and growl. And on "Victor," which is basically a jazz song about jazz, Grace actually sings beautifully. She sings straight from her character. As for the notes, well, now she just sneaks right up and hits 'em.

This album sounds like batshit to me. I don't know about AM radio, but this is going to fill up the dance floor. "Crush" is a great percolating, slinked-out workout. It's got those tight, edgy, half-hesitant, suspended rhythm snags that Nile knows so well. And "I'm Not Perfect" has the right beat and obviously the right message to get the right people on their feet.

There are a lot of great weirdo tunes here too. "White Collar Crime" sounds like a slow hustle tune to me. Maybe it's a rhumba. But Grace sings very strangely, sort of halfway between Billie Holiday and George Sanders. And it really works. "Scary But Fun" is another oddball tune. It's sort of haunting—like melodically and like Halloween. It's got a kiddie innocence and a hard-knocks edge. The title tells it like it is.

"Bamford" is a real beauty. It's got a great boogie beat. It cooks, but with a very simple rhythm track. And over the top Grace and a chorus of wistfully voices chant about walking barefoot in Beverly Hills. Grace takes some confessional declaration breaks that are oddly reminiscent of Bob Dylan while the chorus levitates around. It's a beauty. And so is "Inside Story," the album's production number. I guess the beauty comes from Grace's real-life feelings, but they're translated into a musical complex that's a perfect wedding of the sacred and the secular. It's a real worldly-wise gospel tune that rocks like a chip off the old ages.

Grace is a monster because whatever she is, she's always herself. Even when she's phony, she's real phony. And when she's real, she's genius. She's a total original. Even if she attempts to pull off a cliché, she can't help but transform it into something special. And when she tries to do something special, as she's done here, it's pop art at its best. She takes music, and she reinvents it. This is wild, baroque, original, far-fetched, irresistible, grandiose, outlandish and gorgeous. It might seem like the Twilight Zone, but when you get down to it, it's soul music.

Billy Idol
Whiplash
Chrysalis

Growing up in public is a tough act, but it's also the hottest ticket of the season. Madonna, Cyndi, and now Billy Idol have all turned common in their lives and marked these metamorphoses with changes in style and material. For these video pop stars, bravura has been replaced with reflection and love has been freed from an obsession into a muse.

Idol's new outlook is packed with romance and wistfulness. He steps forward on his new video, "To Be a Lover," with an apology—he "torped" to be a lover. On "Whiplash forgotten Boy," Idol sings with a wistful sadness: "My heart is breaking, recorded in sound." On "Sweet Surrender," he laments that someone's building "candy castles" for his beloved. The curled lip is still visible, but now it's more a trademark than a sign of contempt.

Part of the change of pace is attributable to Idol's personal life and part is attributable to guiding Steve Stevens. The pairing of the perfectionist and the avant-garde created a fascinating tension on Rebel Yell. But now Stevens has stepped forward from some alter-school guitar solo to check out the George (or more like) Barry Kessel tradition on "Man for All Seasons I," and that combined with producer Keith Funney's search for rock radio perfection, has resulted in a disc, more polished-out album—one that some listeners might consider an inescapable digression from Rebel Yell.

Keith Funney has kept the tracks clear and impeccably placed. The drums are "chopped" to the max, and there's a mid-tempo to the sound that is probably the result of a bank of chained keyboards. Despite Funney's state-of-the-art max, there is still a blow-dried afterlife to the LP, as well as some unnecessary baggage.

Though the music may sound a little different from previous Idol solo work, the stance on Whiplash Smile is strongly reminiscent of another New York duo—Marty Rev and Alan Vega (aka Suicide). Rev and Vega set the tone for the good, the bad, and the ugly of '80s techno-pop, and spiritually as well as musically Idol and Stevens stand on Suicide's shoulders to reach a far wider audience. The borrowings are not accidental. Steve Stevens is a student of the New philosophy of not wising, i.e., turning obvious into dangerous, and the approach is handied on his nosed "Fatal Charm" and "All Summer Single." Idol has gone through Alan Vegas' closet pretty carefully, taking the best of his repertoire in it. Vega's "hey, baby" phraseology and sewer-rat-as-shaman persona leaving behind the excess.

But hey, this is the music business—ya snore, ya lose. If Suicide aren't around to write songs like "All Summer Single," "Sweet Surrender," and "To Be a Lover," at least Billy and Steve can do it. While Suicide blew itself apart after a couple of records, Idol and Stevens have worked unmercifully on a derivative cosmology. In fact, like all great derivations, Idol and Stevens have developed a set of their own trademarks. Tunes like "Worlds forgotten Boy" (with its "White Wedding" break) and "Beyond Belief" (with its spooling "Eyes Without a Face" moose-eyed chorus) are Idol's emulations of himself rather than others.

Besides, if Idol has succeeded commercially, it is not merely from knowing the proper sources, it is from understanding the nature of pop stardom—top your hat, but keep your eye on the mirror. On "Don't Need a Gun" Idol sings:

*Johnny kept the shiny light
Johnny Ray, he's always crying
Gene Vincent I cry, who slapped John
And me, I'm moving, moving on*

If there is an essence to Whiplash Smile, that's it. Coming of age for a pop star has to be seen in the perspective of performance and history. Every punk, from his head turned around by love, to the nature of the game—but let's be punk: like Billy Idol or John McEneaney, the metamorphosis is unmercifully scrutinized. Sometimes a young artist like Idol needs this turmoil to fuel him past the mags of youth and youthful emotions into the responsibilities of maturity. Though Whiplash Smile is not the fearless and stylized statement of Rebel Yell, it is an ambitious and inspiring record that tells more about Billy Idol's future than his past. The only mite caterpillar who gave us "White Wedding" is emerging from his cocoon in a poetic rock butterfly.

Swans
Holy Money
PVC

Records by the Swans have so little to do with pleasure, fun, and the, uh, joy of living that it's no off-a-log-log explanation why they always suck at my ear like some wa-hungry insect. It sounds dumber than vomit to say the Swans are "important" and thus worthy of your time, money, attention, but unfortunately this statement is truth.

Let's face it, power over others (and the potential to acquire the same) is the only motivational cattle prod that can really make people crawl out of bed in the morning. Sleepy-eyed slugs shuffling around in the morning sun either want to get their hands on some of that magical force and make the fucker most pups dance to their tune, or they're twitching at the flux of somebody else's strings. Power is the thing, an it wins, and no vocal music has ever been about power the way the Swans do.

This new album, the band's eighth disk, feels like the culmination of the Swans' most recent "suite" of records ("Time Is Money," EE, Covered Up, "A Screw" [R], Holy Money LP), and as such it contains the ugriest wrench (and presumably definitive versions of these songs released earlier in the set).

"Fuck," "Money Is Flesh," and "A Screw (Holy Money)" are all put down with the economic clarity but paramilitary precision that has marked the band's recent live shows. And as with martial music, the beat is almost everything here. Melodic inventions are occasionally introduced (most often by mouth), but the essential sound is a pummeling cadence that results when melody, harmony, and rhythm achieve a state of singularity that slowly, steadily consumes everything in its sight. This beat (or lack of a better term) can be made by either drums, guitar bass, keyboards, or voices; the instruments can operate solo or in groups. The best can be one simple thrasher or a series of congnatal whumps that collide and go crashing off into your mental underbrush. All these combinations are used. And no matter which formula is chosen, the effect is powerful and brutal.

The one exception to this is "You Need Me," which features vocals by Jarboe (the band's female keyboard player) and sounds like the whimper of a victim lying broken on the street. But while this track is set apart from the rest of the album musically, it certainly is a of a piece with Holy Money's spiritual core.

Singer/guitarist Gata's words here (as elsewhere) are about the fringes and excesses of power at the lowest level. Sick of your boss? Knock him down and bulldoze him. You love me? OK, die for me. These are the sorts of thoughts Gata feels compelled to air in his lower-than-luggy bass. And his wail in howled inside walls hears of pure fucker's stone. And it's not real pretty, but it's sure as shit bigger than you.

Christmas
in Exile/Dio Doyle
Big Time

Not so long ago something happened that left its mark on me. It was walking down the street wondering how to dispose of what scratch I had left in my pockets. A salad bar and a tall milk? New socks for the Air Jordans? I didn't know, so I just walked down the stairs to this record store and started flipping through the new arrivals. There was this one record, sort of beige with a picture of that really expensive slump, the flip-flopped laplase, in bright colors. Anyways, I got the record, and I took it home, and I put it on, and it blew my mind. It do-si-do'd with my medulla oblongata, it got me thinking. Because that's the Christmas album, Jack, and that's the best thing in the world. Or damned close. Even with their college-radio-play-begittin' "ignorance," Christmas has, after four years plus, released a debut LP for the annals.

Christmas comes off like the spoiled brat grease of rock on Doyle. Not an unfriendly uch'n necessarily, just don't leave the handsets near the microwave or the keys in the Grand Torino. Christmas provides all over both sides of this slab on Liz Coe's sluggy poppy drumming and Mike Cuddey's gnarly guitar. With all the melody in tow, you've got to liken them to a pop band. Happily, their pop's machinel borders on defiance. Sing-along pop? It is all but impossible not to sing along with Liz push daveil degradation as the best way to get attention ("Loved Ones") and Golden Books as read by Genet ("Tennis the Truck") says "you are not beneath my wheels." Beyond the passing allusions to Hitler's final moments, Kenneth Anger, and pop culture's blossom, Mike Cuddey's lyrics are clever, his depiction of a happy-sad world where degradation and glee walk hand in hand and shit and beauty are indistinguishable borders on it say borders on because I really hate to use this word: poetry.

At the very least, in Exile/Dio Doyle is the best rock 'n' roll record—perhaps the only rock 'n' roll record—on which "sunt" is pronounced sunt. At the very least, it's the best rock 'n' roll record ever. Or damned close.

Iggy Pop
Blah Blah Blah
(A & M)

Iggy Pop is one of our few Perfect Rock Stars. First of all, his adopted name is truly genius. What's even more genius is that he's never made his real name, James Osterberg Jr., any great secret. We love him for that. We trust a man who allows us a peek at his normality. Then, we're happy to be led to believe that his real name is about all that is normal about him. Let's face it, this man's reputation is the to-hell-and-back variety. Didn't he use to roll around bare-chested on broken glass? Have sex with and get beaten up by the audience during performances? Which is exactly as it should be. We like our rock heroes to live on the edge. Next, he's small and aging. It's important that when one sees a rock star collapse one immediately exclaims, "My God, I didn't know he was so short!" Age is also important, because a rock star has to be around long enough for us to assess quality or lack of quality.

In addition, Iggy has always been sufficiently avant garde to be either an influence or a contemporary. The pack has never left him behind. We look forward to each new Iggy record not as the latest embodiment of a growing rift, but with an enthusiastic curiosity.

One's enthusiasm rises even more with this album when we discover that another Perfect Rock Star, David Bowie, is coproducing (with David Richards), since the Bowie-Iggy combination created excellent results with Rain Power, Just for Life, and The Idiot. Here, Bowie counters many of the songs with Iggy. Steve Jones (remember the Sex Pistols?) it's OK, neither do I count the rest with Iggy, but enough of this blah, blah, blah. Let's hear the latest dear Iggy has stuffed up his sleeve or down his pants, which brings us to another area of Perfect Rock Star legend. Of Mr. Pop has gained quite a reputation in . . . don't worry, I wouldn't touch this rumor with a . . . forget it.

"Real Wild Child." Remember Chris Spink's "Wild Wild Women"? Probably not. You should, it's a great song. Take this selection, strip away the "Hermes" sound and the "Cruel Suits of First Seasoning," and you pretty much have it. Give any DJ an extended remix of this, and an entire dance floor will come together. . . and I'm not talking Beatles. "Baby It Can't Fail" is next. Bullshit. The energy certainly does. Lost when things should be going somewhere, all gets lost under a cute little recording room technique that makes the voice sound like it's falling. Get it? Better yet, skip it. By the end, the mix is such a swamping, I think I'm listening to Sgt. Pepper. And I do mean the Beatles. "Shades" is a sweet love ballad. Very Bowie in nature. The words are the best—sort of an ode to a pair of sunglasses. Of course this is all very symbolic and merely a copy literary device to explain what our hero really needs to get turned on. . . blah, blah, blah. Imagine Lou Reed at his most innocent remember "Perfect Day"? Come to think of it, didn't Bowie produce that too?

You were my flag
Life's not a drag
I like these shades

An airplane takes off, and a sound reminding one of Procol Harum's "A Saily Dog" opens up "Fire Girl." We're back on the dance floor again.

I love you when you kiss your raincoat
I'll love you when you lose your teeth

Here come those words again. Lord, it's over too soon. "Isolation" is the essence of Phil Spector (is that Bowie on sax?) I'm such a pushover for sax. This song certainly gets a kick in the ass from it.

Side two begins with the single "Cry for Love." I must say that this sounds more like a Billy Idol number than the latest Billy Idol does. Things get pretty strange with "Blah, Blah, Blah." This is kind of Alan Vega meets a beatbox gone wild. The words sound like a year's worth of the evening news all strung together. Not for the faint of mind. We're then Morse-coded into "Hedonism," which bemoans the modernization of towns and industry's demonic effect on the country and their dreams of escape. I guess Iggy needs more than mere shades by this point. In the background a guitar is playing the line from "Running Scared" (and all I can think of is Dean Stockwell doing "Candy Colored Clouds" in Blue Velvet, so I get soaked and space out and, what do you know, it's the closing track, "Winners and Losers." "Wake up time! Hit the dance floor again, my tender little pork bellies. We're back in production—Pepperland once more. As for the lyric:

She gave me money
She gave me bread
She gave me everything
And then she went dead

Iggy, you're too much.

This isn't the best Iggy Pop album ever. Bowie's influence tends to bury him. It's such a shame that this could have been a Bowie album (and he's best effort). Not that I have anything against Bowie. He's a Perfect Rock Star. It's just that I feel very chauvinistic when it comes to Iggy because I'm from Michigan, so he's my Bruce Springsteen. If Bowie produced Springsteen the way, the entire state of New Jersey would go berserk. Now don't get me wrong, this record is filled with many wonderful moments. It's just that this is the equivalent of having a little coffee with your sugar.

—Anita Sarkis

Morti Jones
Match Game
A & M

Morti Jones has the sort of thick, honeyed voice you could spread over homemade biscuits. Dirty Springfield with a little Sandy Denny and Jackie DeShannon on the side. Unapologetic Time, last year's debut, was an unqualified delight, a wonderful sampling of songs by jazz-jazz writers like Peter Holsapple and producer Don Dixon. Match Game, her second album, follows the same formula but with less success. Don Dixon, who brought such a light touch to her first record and put a spin on albums by Dinkytown and the Sirens, is, strangely, heavy-handed here, long on bombast and short on playfulness.

Part of the problem is the material. The inclusion of songs by Marshall Crenshaw, Richard Barone, Linn Stennberg, Dwight Twilley, and David Bowe must have seemed like a good idea on paper, but on vinyl none of them quite works; the songs run out of steam on the way to the bridge and never recover. Morti Jones has nice instincts and respectable, intelligent phrasing, but she's too much of a fan, too aware of the sources, to completely inhabit the songs. She tries them on as if they were her best friend's clothes, admiring the stitching, knowing all the while they don't really fit; that they were made or bought for someone else.

The songs have the classic pop form without the musical or emotional undertow that draws you back to them, that implants them firmly in your head whether you want them there or not. These are the ghosts of pop songs. You see them in the hall-light, trotting down the hall in their bell-bottoms, you look away, and they're gone.

There are exceptions. Tom Costello's "Lost a Memory," with its guitar figure from "Hesitate Come the Night" and its Bart Bacharach melisma, is a chilling little song, beautifully sung, and all of Don Dixon's songs, particularly "Be Atque! Again," co-written by Jones, are fresh and buoyant.

If she can't do a whole album of Dixon's material, then at least get this girl some songs by Peter Holsapple or Jackie DeShannon or PJ Sloan. After all, with a voice like this, one she-la-la's worth a thousand words.

AMAZING GRACE.

Taj Mahal
by Gromovision

A few years ago I was producing a blues and country singer, Lucinda Williams, in a small studio in New York and heard that Taj Mahal was passing through town, doing a little recording (for this album, as it turns out). I got the idea they should record together, and I tracked him down at his hotel. He was skeptical but amused and flattered that he'd been sought out, and after renegeating his five live upped collar and a donut to a bottomless cup and two donuts, he agreed to come over.

He appeared the next morning a little after 11, a big man in an oversized jacket and floppy beanie, nodding his head and chomping on an apple slice. He listened to the song, a traditional blues, that Lucinda wanted to record with him, he sat very still, but his hands folded and unfolded over each other constantly, and when he'd heard enough to know that she was serious, that there was a real spark moving inside her, he lost his suspicious look and got down to business, tapping out a counter-rhythm with his foot, redirecting her phrasing by tilting his head or beaming down with a side-part part. And within half an hour it was a different piece of music, a tired old blues had come back to life, and deep inside it you could hear the hellhounds barking and wailing.

That's what Taj does on his own records. He'll resurrect strange old songs, take a reggae number that strikes his fancy, find a second-rate pop song that has some first-class changes in it, and play them, reprocess them, find that little spark that made the songwriter write them in the first place and fan it into a full-blown flame.

Taj, his first album in about eight years, is a little more studied, a little less casual than his earlier records, and at first glance seems pretty unpromising: synthesizers, drum machines, and a version of Selma Robinson's disco hit "Pillow Talk" don't look well. But Taj's juju is more powerful than any technology, when he walks into a room, drum machines shudder and shut off, synthesizers roll over on their backs and wave their legs in the air, and vivid, mediocre little songs surrender their identities and take on a whole new life, a whole new meaning.

Taj (the album) is overarranged, overproduced, without the offhand beauty of his acoustic records or the intimacy and depth of his work on Kap Hanrahan's recent tribute to Ishmael Reed (Conjure on American Clay). But Taj the man seems able to transcend any obstacle in his path, he's almost too powerful a force to be contained on a record. He flirts with calypso, covering soca singer the Mighty Shabazz's popular anthem "Everybody Is Somebody," dips down to a Barry White-ish voice for "Pillow Talk," and glides his way through "Snoochi," a ballad by Jae Mason, a big guy who used to be the bouncer outside the Busman Line. Throughout, Taj hums and growls and grunts and sings in and out of tune, and somehow it doesn't matter, he walks happy, saking along with a joy and a strut and a style that transcends the material, fashion, and time. But make me want to go over and shake his hand and buy him another couple of donuts.

GRACE JONES INSIDE STORY

The new album. Includes "I'M NOT PERFECT (BUT I'M PERFECT FOR YOU)" plus 9 other great songs.

New Order Brotherhood Quest

As you probably know, there are other dimensions besides our own. In these other dimensions, people who look just like us do similar things and even take up the same space as we do. But because they are in another dimension, we can't really see or hear them. Sometimes, when I go to record stores or dance clubs, I can sense the other dimension. I can sense that something like music is being played and something like dancing is going on.

In this other dimension, New Order's Brotherhood is going to be a big smash. It will fly up the other dimension charts and probably be so big that I'll begin to wonder if any dimension isn't the other dimension.

The main problem is that my world is too crowded to accommodate New Order. If I want moody, layered British dance-rock with an amazing vocal style, I've already got Richard Butler and the Psychedelic Furs. If I want doglike lyric sensibility over moody chords and a drum machine, I've already got Andy Ditch and the Sisters of Mercy. And if I want Lou Reed-styled vocals over a din of instrumentation, I've got a whole pile of Lou Reed and Velvet records (FYI: check out "Every Little Counts" for the latest in VU simulation).

For the most part, Brotherhood is a lot of order and not much new—exactly the kind of stuff that is so appealing to radio and MTV, because it hints at being daring but is unrepentantly predictable and devoid of soul. I support synthesizers as much as the next guy, but after a couple of spins, you wonder if the New Orderies should plug their fingers into the sockets instead of the DX-7. "All Day Long" and "Bizarre Love Triangle," with their endless arpeggios, sound more like overbaked ELO or Yes than a new-age dance band. As for the drum programming, with the exception of "Ansel Dust" and "All Day Long," the best comes out of reflex rather than a sense of rhythm.

NO's stylistic stance is equally problematic. Hiding behind an anonymous pop persona (the album cover is an industrial blank), the band espouses a tragic lyricism over a techpop arrangement. The lead vocalist exists in a world where he's not grown up and he's not a boy—a world where we "feel no pain and no joy." On "Bizarre Love Triangle" he sings:

*I feel fine, I feel good
I feel like I never could
Whenever I get this way
I just don't know what to say
Why can't we be ourselves like we were yesterday*

Maybe they dig this kind of Psych 101 poetry in the other dimension, but combined with the disco drums and the backlot synth work, the whole package leaves one longing for the honest superfluity of Stacy Q.

Despite all the danceable pretensions, there is some locally redeeming value to Brotherhood. "Parasite" and "Werido" are candy tracks with infectious arrangements. In addition, the group produced the LP themselves, so we can assume they're happy with it (and that's worth something). But for the most part, New Order is an unnecessary excursion on the road of pop music—unless, of course, you're traveling to the other dimension.

—Rich Stone

UNDERGROUND

Column by Andrea 'Enthall

Under the rump of every blow-dried British haircut heartthrob sits a pile of dollar bills, and under those dollars lies the fragile American underground. Same people think it's pro-American rock to be anti-British. Those people don't understand that the health of UK music in the US is what keeps the American underground alive.

That there's an interrelationship between British and American music is no secret. Brits have been going gaga over American rock since it was born. In return, Americans have taken "made in the UK" as a trademark of quality. They've also turned to England to start American careers. Before the release of their British album, Throwing Muses were one of Boston's trendy-endorsed local bands. They hung out with the right people, who got them the right publicity, which made other bands on the Boston scene hate their guts.

So they opted to release their first album in England, on the gauze-and-dreamscapes label 4AD. That album, simply titled Throwing Muses, is a surreal and moody slice of arty rock that alternates lery howson rhythms with folky strumming, warped nasal yodels, and a sparse grandeur that make it easy to see how one person might love and the next loathe them after listening to the same track.

Kristin Hersh has a voice somewhere between the howling, clear style of amateur opsy and a sear calling to its mate. Squawky and quirky, with a deliberate quaver, it cracks in its high range and falls off pitch with a scapery grumble in the low, as if digging along the bottom of the music still like cars tied to the back bumper of a newlywed couple's car. That weirdly warm voice is backed by clear, simple guitar lines and by female choruses that swell imperially, as on "Stand Up," or wander off in anti-harmony. No wall of production disguises the sound of this three-woman-and-one-man crew. In 4AD tradition, the percussion is prominent. With an ice-cold layer of echo, it stands above most of the mix.

If there's a message to the band's murmurings, it's based six feet under metaphors in lines like "Follow the road, swallow a snake: Find shoes in the corner. Run away!" But heck, Hersh sounds good saying it. So what if the album doesn't provide your minimum daily dose of literature? It's got a warily, unattractive charm of its own. You can find 4AD records wherever imports are sold. Their address is 19 Alma Rd., London SW18, England. Their record can also be obtained from Ken Gies, Box 951, North Dartmouth, MA 02747. "Fish," a non-4AD track by the Muses, is available on a flexidisc for $2 with issue 2 of the fanzine Great Recipies for Hated Tunes, Suite 105, PO Box 9038, Waltham, MA 02254.

Fellow scenerist Roger Miller didn't leave Boston to release his first solo LP. He had prebabe credentials in that town. As a well-known member of both Mission of Burma and Birdsongs of the Mesozoic, he had automatic acceptance in his home city. Beyond Boston, the cause of the synth lingers on among the utopians of the underground. No Man Is an Island. Me is a synthesizer album full of fast-moving screeches, squawks and squeals, chunky, fuzz-crusted electrochords, and a clarinet that sounds like a lovesick iron gate. Beneath this cornucopia of witters

no man is burfing me and textures, Miller and his companions lay down a very human beat with African-inspired drumming, real cymbals, tone-toms, saxophone, and even keyboards. No Man is a thunderous rhythm test. Clonking and pounding, echoing and squealing with sweeping, streaked shards of sound, Miller lays down complex instruments that travel between speakers in a way no humanly limited guitar locked in a studio isolation booth ever could. A real recorded tone pulls into Kenmore Station. A synthesized companion joins it, throwing sparks from its imaginary wheels all over the song. Backward chords match in rhythm, and oscillation twist in agony. The synthesizer has gotten a reputation as a limited instrument because too many musicians lend their imaginations when they design synth sounds freed from mauling drums, electric origins, strings, and horns, the synthesizer can be as wild and emotional as a roller coaster, creating sounds and textures no ear has heard before. Miller has the vision to twist those tones into music, instead of hollow and/or howling, and he has a sense of humor to go with his sense of melody. Just check out his version of the other Roger Miller's "King of the Road." His current and previous work can be found on Ace of Hearts Records, P.O. Box 579, Kenmore Station, Boston, MA 02215.

Ask Austin, Texas's, Cargo Cult what they have to do with England, and they'll probably shrug. Their lightly fuzz-coated guitars and rawly sung vocals with recited interludes have the kind of theatricality found in the British band Bauhaus, but not much in common with any specific Bauhaus song. Vocalist Randy Turner goes for the dramatic. Scraped yowls followed by slowly crawled passages where just he, one guitar, and a sparse drum characterize his style. Halloween fascinates Cargo. Little skulls, skeletons, a black cat, and kitschily costumed folk are all over their liner notes. Death, hell, rats, and pain are favorite lyric themes. This sound owes a debt to traditional punk for its heavy drum style and to punk's more contemporary cousin for its metalically searing squa-pat. Monthly, Cargo spins tunes with a delicate clarity on Strange Men Bearing Gifts. It's a sparklingly produced album of lecture, tempo, and tonal changes. From the sizzly scratch choruses in "Empty House" through the dramatic jungle drumming, grunted chants, moans, and eerily spliced feedback wails in "Pump House," it's an album that moves and flows and changes throughout its long and twisting groove. It's available through Touch and Go Records, P.O. Box 433, Dearborn, MI 48121, which is fun available to stores through most import distributors in the US.

The indie/import connection grew up with the punk boom of the late '70s, though they had nothing to do with each other beyond being in the same place at the same time. Because importers were distributors and not creators, and independent labels were creators without distribution, their relationship was naturally symbiotic. That relationship helped to make it possible for Mission of Burma to be more than some Boston bar band. Recent lawsuits under section 102 of the 1976 copyright law—known as the garbled importing law—are threatening the indie/import connection. Unknown American bands—like Two Small Bodies—will pay the price.

There are three full-sized people behind Two Small Bodies, a grumpy whoop-along ensemble that combines the spook and roots influences of the Gramps with Kentucky country blues. They've embossed that combination onto one small single, "Silly Dawg." With a drum pulse so softly clacked that it sounds like it could have been pounded on two extra-firm pillows, and a deep guitar crowd that bubbles in pools of bluesy darkness then squeals up to another backwoods whoop, they pop that ole country question in the kind of southern-fried accents you expect to hear over a bowl of grits. They can be found by contacting Solar Records Ltd., 127 Prall St. #1, Lexington, KY 40508.

The parallel importing law was designed to prevent an entrepreneur from converting head-to-head with in "sensitive" imports put it at risk under the parallel importing law. A couple of months later, one of the oldest distributors in the US, Greenworld, also ceased operations. Neither Greenworld nor Caroline of California were major forces, but the trend their dissolution may foreshadow is a monster to be watched with fear. The difference between the underground of the early '70s and early '80s is distribution. Destroy distribution and you destroy the future of music.

Our future is in little bands. Except for rare industry concoctions (such as Asia or Blind Faith), every band starts underground and looks hesitantly toward the future, knowing that the odds are tremendously against their surviving to be heard by more than relatives and friends. Album covers, label affiliations, and band names all create expectations that must be either met or met. The front cover of Sand in the Face's debut album is as misleading as Two Small Bodies' name. On it the band, in tough-guy leather jackets and floppy, trend-happy pants, stand before an airbrushed skyline of Miami Vice pastels. Around

"schemes." But you get a lot more of something you'd never expect from a band named after brain cells: guitars piece and luzzzy, slashing at 100 miles a minute over a slam-speed drum, they fuse the fury of punk with the seething of '60s-inspired psychedelia to create six searing tracks on the album Like It Back. From punk they've stolen their vocal style, a hoarse and heavy shout that barely tries to couple the lyrics to musical notes. From psychedelia they've borrowed an altered paranoia, which surfaces in the track "Hired."

A hypocritically swirling scanner,

American releases by buying a US title from a country where monetary exchange rates or labor laws make it possible to sell the records for less. It was never intended to prevent the importing of records unavailable in the US, but that's how it's being used. In March, Caroline Records Inc. of New York was sued for importing certain CD titles whose copyright was held by US companies. At the time American companies were often unable to fulfill demand for CDs. Caroline settled out of court, and in the aftermath of the lawsuit, its sister company, Caroline Records of California, folded because its business them float nine-wave rectangles, but theirs isn't an album of carefree videopop. The wave they're on is tidal. Sand in the Face's music is marigold-punk. With ranted rhythm vocals and hand-pounding drums, Sand crunches through short and simple three-chord bashes and passages of snare guitar. When they have vocals, they play for speed and energy. You can bring their spiky, unschooled energy into your own home by contacting the Independent Label Alliance, P.O. Box 594M, Bay Shore, NY 11706.

With a name like Gray Matter you expect some kind of college-educated pop: thesaurus words that exist only for vocabulary quizzes and thirty-two introspection with a liberal arts degree. You get a little of that when Gray Matter rhymes "confusion" with "illusion" and "dreams" with "Hired" shivers in wild hysteria and leaps from the speakers with hell-bound screams. If you've ever seen a child sobbing and gasping in convulsive tears, you'll understand Matter's power: as their guitars suddenly pare down to a whisper of slowly slithered sinews, then burst with even more ferocity just when you thought they'd fade. And you'll understand the emptiness of the record's ending: there's a clank and everything stops, like a broken-bottle slosh to the jugular, leaving an awful, empty silence. That silence comes from Duchard Records, 3819 Beecher St. NW, Washington, DC 20007.

Until the 7902, there has never been a CD player and FM/AM tuner engineered together in a complete 7"x 2" unit, to fit the dash of virtually any car.

Like the Lamborghini, every cubic inch of the 7902 is serious performance technology. By redesigning and applying advanced Alpine technology to each element in the system, we've created an entertainment package that easily handles rough roads and weak radio signals.

The 3-beam laser pickup created for the 7902 is about 70% lighter than others. It reads data more accurately and rides on a precision drive mechanism that absorbs mechanical backlash, ensuring outstanding tracking accuracy.

The laser transport is protected against road-shock by a silicon-oil suspension system, and is mounted on a rigid zinc die-cast chassis to maintain perfect alignment.

Our T-10 II Tuner[™] utilizes multiple FM circuits on a single tiny chip, smaller than ever before, for superior reliability and reception.

How does it sound? You'll just have to audition it at an Alpine dealer. Come on in when you're ready to get serious.

RICHARD LLOYD REANIMATOR

The first thing Richard Lloyd does in the morning before he showers, brushes his teeth, or has his morning tea with lemon, is play guitar. He reaches out of bed in his New York apartment, turns on the television, turns down the sound, and plays Lloyd's '84 Slak. It's an indelible green, one of the "colors of the rags around the planet Saturn," he says. His apartment is considerably less elaborate, although I can't tell you much more about the place because Lloyd and his management wouldn't let me interview him there. "You wouldn't be comfortable," said Lloyd's manager, Jim Fouzart.

After he has lunch at a coffee shop near his place, it's more guitar. After dinner, the same thing, until he goes to sleep around 3 A.M.

"But don't print that," says Lloyd. "It think it's dull." Dull and provocative. The clay image of the guitar hero basking in his obsession is as brilliant as it is dullness. So is Richard Lloyd. Artistic license being what it is, he can change personas quickly, especially when the topic is rock 'n' roll. Anyway, he shouldn't worry about being dull, because once he starts to play guitar, the matter is settled.

It's hard for Lloyd to remember the best times of his life. Not because his memory isn't good, but between then and now a lot's happened that he's almost forgot: drug addiction, alsholem—a nervous breakdown—and a long, well-orchestrated campaign to clean himself up. His recent well-received return to recording—the U.S. release of his album Field Of Fire—a new band, and a successful series of concerts, including an audience shattering at New York's Ritz, have not erased the past. Ironically or rather expectably, his rebound time has called attention to it.

"You can ask questions about the drug thing, and we do want it in the story, but we just don't want it to be the whole story," Lloyd's manager instructs me before the interview, and I have to agree with him. Lloyd's drug problems have been the most impressive part of any story that's been written about him for the past five years.

Richard arrives at the SPM offices for the interview in black, except for a red flannel shirt and white socks. His only nervous habit is scratching his left hand. He is somber about all topics except music—past or present—which can get him to laugh, tell arse stories, or offer sharp opinions.

Originally the guitarist intended to be a drummer, because he was the kind of kid who was always banging things. Every Christmas his parents bought him one drum, but by the time he got the whole set, he'd lost interest.

When Lloyd was 16, a guy named Vello introduced him to Jim Hendrix, and he spent the rest of his teen years hanging out around a guitar god, studying Hendrix's every move, trying to figure out "what he had that made him so special." Lloyd and Hendrix never became friends but, he says with pride and self-amusement, "I got to be the mouse in the room."

Soon, however, Hendrix began thinking that this teenager who was so quietly observing him was actually patronizing him, and one night he punched Lloyd in the nose. At the time, Lloyd understood this too mean that the guitar god was handing him the great legacy of the instrument. He shakes his head now at the thought and laughs at his own foolishness.

Lloyd is always trying to get close enough to people to "penetrate their auras," to find out what they have that makes them succeed. In this way he has discovered self-assurance: a great willingness to succeed, and carrying a guitar all the time as of equal importance.

"Back then everyone carried a guitar. The object was never to be caught without one, so you had to drag the thing around. It meant you had a purpose in life."

In the mid-'70s, Lloyd joined Tom Verlaine to form the band Television, a forerunner of the early New York new wave movement.

"Those were happy days," he says. "There was a cohesiveness to that whole movement. There were the bands—us, Talking Heads, Blondie, The Ramones, Mek Deville—and there were the managers and the kids who hung around. Then, because of that, there was the whole magazine thing—New York Rocker, Punk. We used to invite the press down to rehearsals, give them a gallon of wine, and say 'Listen!'"

Lloyd had a great time, renting places to play, making up the publicity signs, rehearsing in Chinatown, and playing in one of the first New York bands to get involved in "lacking the existing system." A hit record and major cult status followed, and Lloyd and Verlaine were soon appreciated for their individual, innovative guitar styles. Then Malcolm McLaren took the whole idea back to England, and a funny thing happened. The fun stopped.

Lloyd released his first solo album, Alchemy, and the critics did not save. He and Verlaine developed their relationship to the point it is today. "We say hello to each other. That's about it. Basically, we are both very strange people. I am very intense, and I always demand that of other people. I guess the drugs supplied me with that intensity for a while." So did alcohol, and by the time of Alchemy's release, Lloyd had acquired addictions to both.

"My drug and alcohol habits have been well documented," he says impatiently, and he won't answer further. It's not that he's trying to be evasive or private. He's simply trying to forget.

"I just want to put that behind me. OK?"

OK. Lloyd says that every day he goes to meetings "of various support groups," and you're supposed to understand that these are AA and drug counseling sessions—meetings he's used to bring his life to where it is finally OK.

Now he sits so calmly and controlled that it's hard to imagine he ever had a problem with anything in his life. He wears the weary look of a guy who's worn more than he'd like to, but he reanimates whenever the subject returns to music.

On the cover of his new album, Field Of Fire (previously it was only available in Sweden), Lloyd is sitting on a cellar stair that looks suspiciously like CBE's. The picture could have been taken ten years ago because Lloyd doesn't look like he's aged one day, but it's a recent photo, shot downstairs at Maxwell's, a current musicians hangout in Hoboken, New Jersey. "Some spirit," he says and admits to going there often. Richard still needs to hang out around music as much as he did when he was a kid.

Field Of Fire has the critics' blessings this time and has a good chance of changing people's memories of Lloyd. It's a happier project, more optimistic and less nasty than anything he did with Verlaine. It's become deeply religious, which is reflected in the positive outlook of Field Of Fire. The album is upbeat, on one song, "Black to White," he describes a place in Sweden that's so bleak it's 20 below zero but it's still "a nice place to go to think things out." The guitar is perfect, the leads compelling. The songs are at once stoned and beautiful guitar-lovers songs that sometimes sound like Springsteen and sometimes sound like Lou Reed, but mostly sound like Lloyd to people who remember what Lloyd can sound like at his best.

You can compare him to other people if you'd like. Lloyd doesn't really mind. Although if you call him a guitar hero like Hendrix, or anyone else, Lloyd just shrugs it off. All that guitar-hero stuff, well, it's boring. ☐

Bon Jovi is No. 1; anti-crack and anti-gam hysteria have generated movements, wide lapels are back. Ric Ocasek has another solo album, and the NFL has neutered the game in order to project a myth of law and order. The forces of good are in retreat. And despite the success of Run-DMC, radio formats continue to draw a tighter line on rap music. Rappers have responded by ignoring radio and making raw street records. This means the end of the crossover compromise and confers both a liberation and an obligation on the artists. What's the point of making sweet underground records? So you get a lot of violence and sexuality on records, and also a lot of sexiness. Not to mention a lot of anti-crack hysteria and more samples from Bob James's "Mardi Gras" than you can shake a stick at.

Anita Baker, "Caught up in the Rapture" b/w "Mystery" (Elektra)

The keepers of the black cultural legacy have burdened Anita Baker, along with Freddie Jackson and Luther Vandross, with the onus of resurrecting sweet soul music. Which is unfair. Baker has neither the emotional muscle nor the direct language to carry the weight. She does, however, make very satisfying, very pretty, bourgeois pop soul records, and this is one of 'em. Baker uses her limited repertoire of intonations with enough finesse to create a sensuous dream of signed elegance. "Caught up in the Rapture" neatly avoids telling: (a) What it's like to be caught up in theapture of love (other than that it's magical), (b) Why she's caught up in it (other than that she knew it would happen from the first time she met the guy), (c) Who has her in theapture, and (d) What the hell she's going to do about it. Does being caught up in theapture interfere with everyday life? Show us some faces, Anita, tell us what they said.

Aretha Franklin, "Jumpin' Jack Flash" b/w "Integrity" (Arista)

Freddie's pomp that does more to reinforce the idea of the Rolling Stones as deadweight than the entire Undercover album. In this new argument, even the Stones' old material rates as arena schlock lit for an aging R&B singer to oversing. And she does. To Franklin's credit, she pounds this baby into the ground with authority. If the Stones were to remake (a)le now, it'd suck, so you can imagine how wrong producer Keith Richards is in resurrecting "[J] Flash." The irrelevancy blues ain't nothing but a good song redone bad. Stick a fork in it, "Jumpin' Jack Flash" is done. A fan can only wish she'd done the Jesus and Mary Chain's "Upside Down" instead.

DJ Jazzy & Fresh Prince "Girls Ain't Nothing but Trouble" (Word-Up)

DJ Jazzy Jeff and Fresh Prince featuring Ice Cream "Tee" b/w "Guys Ain't Nothing but Trouble" (Word-Up)

Lesson No. 1: current hip hop economics promotes trash. An anti-rap record provides an anti-female answer record, the two as a package get more airplay than they could separately, and an ashtray producer can score two hits with one idea. Pretty neat. Which is maybe why, since "La-Di-Da-Da," the former studs of the microphone have been complaining about women's sexual appetites. Fear of sex makes a good battle position.

On the first record the fellas have two nasty encounters with horny females. One woman cries rape when the man rejects her advances; the other turns out to have a large boyfriend who arrives on the scene at an inopportune moment, chasing our main out of the Gator sheets and back-naked into the snow. Ice Cream "Tee's" female response is no less stereotyped in its view of women: "We like to be wined and dined by candlelight." But it is a funnier record. Specially because, after she learns that her date intends to put her to work on the Deuce, she pulls a Smith & Wesson. These are both excellent records, but if this is really what love is about, you gotta wonder why anyone bothers.

Ana Domino, "Summer" (Les Disques du Crapuscule import)

Remixer Arthur Baker inflates Ana Domino's least idiosyncratic song into a thoroughly schlocky pop dance single. Domino's good stuff given you a reluctant look into a private world that's both intriguing and uncomfortable: you wanna see what's in there, but you don't wanna be around when she falls to pieces. "Summer" doesn't do this, and for that, it isn't a very interesting record. The beat is too big, too insistently the body of the present, for this to work as a bifurcated look at the past. As a bit of grime neo-Motown pop it ain't bad; at least it's not obnoxious. But there are better things to hum on a clear afternoon.

Was (Not Was), "Rober Girl" b/w "Earls to Darns" (Mercury import)

Even back on the airfield: "Out Come the Freaks," Was (Not Was)'s approach to dance music was more cultist than crossover: the work of a couple of white guys who owned a lot of disco 12-inches and saw the potential for exploitation within a dance mix. Like Adrian Sherwood or George Clinton, they jam ideas around a beat. Unlike Devo or the B-52's, they don't call attention to their artifice. The result is a contradiction:

around a musical construction—the rigid computer beat—the Was brothers dance their way out of their constructions. This lot of hard disco comes with a catchy chant, some slippery extended funk chords, a lot of drums, and a shadow of misogyny: “She vacuum the carpets and doesn’t complain/She’ll walk the dog in the pouring rain.” Better when they addressed the Reagan age with the plea, “Tell me that I’m dreaming” I lie anyway, but I’m not proud of this fact.

Crew Devotion: “We’re All Going to Heaven” (Gitter)

Well, I’ll be. Crew Devotion challenge Doug E. Fresh’s claim to have made the last religious rap (“All the Way to Heaven”) and threaten to kick his ass for ripping them off. Of all the etc., etc. As if this were a distinction worth battling over. Message here being, you can’t front on God. And which to argue with that? A sorta okay record, but pretty baffling.

8 Fats, “Wopple” (Posse)

Slow, all the way lean piece of funky rap. Like Toots & the Maytals’ “Free-will” dance, this is an instructional record. Pure product for now dancers. And like any good dance craze record, it exalts its audience more than it raps. “The wop dance is not hard to do/Matter fact it’s easier than the boogaloo/You just move your head up and down/And roll your fists around and around/Then you kick your feet to the funky beat/Then you get a little bolder, you add your shoulder/The music’s grooving, your body’s moving/There’s one more thing that must be included/That’s the hand-claps, that’s the key to it all/Then you put it all together you be having a ball/Doing the wop.” Sounds easy. But most encouraging is B. Fats’s modesty: “If I can do it, you can do it too.”

Opposite: B-fats walks to his favorite wop spot, left: Kool Moe Dee gets a clean bill of health. Below: Anita Baker collapses under all that weight

Kool Moe Dee: “Go See the Doctor” b/w “Monster Crock” (Roc-A-Fella)

Along with Spoonie Gee, former Touché 21-2’s Three fromman Kool Moe Dee is still probably the smoothest one-man act from the old school. He tells stories in this anti-female tale-Moe Dee makes the ugly claim, “The poontang was dope/And you know that I rocked her/but three days later/Go see the doctor.” It really is a funny story, and with warmth and complete self-interest, but I’m getting tired of all this anti-sex talk. And even more tired of the anti-art talk, you’ll find on the B-side. In such regressive times, it’s hard to have a sense of humor about sexism.

Shop Assistants: “I Don’t Wanna Be Friends with You” b/w “Looking Back” & “Mi Day Long (Slow Version)” (Blue Guitar/Chrysalis import)

The tag on these Scots is that they’re teenyboppers, and they don’t do anything to shake it. I don’t want to be crinkled,” says singer, Alex, “You leave me and I’ll scratch your eyes out.” Easy to dismiss this as an affect, as prepubescent as it is, a phony-nag on the group’s adolescent precociousness. Most they be. Everyteen? But after a few leeringly the fresh-faced postures become as palatable as any others, and the band continues to rock the shit out of the hooks. Make no mistake, this isn’t punk as we know it, the Shop Assistants’ third-generation thrash is consciously reverent. But as the title lover’s threats of the A-side adapt themselves time after time into a punk nursery rhyme, and “Looking Back” refuses to adhere at the seams, this becomes my favorite record of the month.

Sideswipes

The Beanie Boys “It’s the New Style” b/w “Paul Revere” (Def Jam/Columbia) once again works both as a hip hop record and a record about hip hop. “Lotta girls a lotta beer and a lotta cum!” Twenty-two automatic on my person. A spaghetti western. The Original Concept begin and end the fallacious “Bite’n My Style” (Def Jam/Columbia) with the line, “Wait a minute. I’m not jamaican,” but they spend the song penitriding in be, even as they complain that other people are pretending to be them. Like T-Money grows the delirious, then goes to a party and finds that all the girls have delirious beards. Hollie’s Shedders run down a violent gangster war in “Drug Rap” (Profile) before calling in Elton John to restore law and order. All right, but too much yakyaky yak. Ice Cube claims to be the only hard-core rapper in L.A., and on the explosive “Dog the Was” b/w “In the Morning” (Techno-Hop) he throws down enough gun talk to support his claim. Tough stuff. The Bang On Chivalry socks out the Chicago house melismatic impetuous on “Samples!” (Gitter), the first major label house release. Mixmaster Gee and the Tamtable Orchestra get just as self-referential in a hip hop jones on “The Manipulator” (MCA), which includes such band details as Gee’s favorite anti-skate setting, all delivered with loose. Divine Sounds come from Brooklyn and they tell all about it on “We and My Posse” (Dunay). “We smoke a bag of buddah/Drink a bottle of wine.” And other, cuter stuff about hanging out at the mall. To the best of “My Ashes.” Awesome Foursome have a great name and a good beat on “Monster Beat” (Dunay), a funky rap with a bassline but too many familiar samples. Why doesn’t somebody sample something fresh? These last three singles appear on Hip Hop Electro 14, the latest cost-effective sampler from Street Sounds. If you can find imports but not rap 12-inches, ask your local importer to order as many volumes of this series as s/he can get a hold of. Then buy ‘em.

DAMN IT, JANET

Janet Jackson declares her freedom on her aggressive breakthrough album. But a battle for power rages around this cool young woman's career.

W alk into the office of one of the hot managers in pop music at the moment, and you are struck: Joe Jackson's outer office is empty, except for his secretary and a young white couple necking in the corner. The walls are filled with publicity photos of his nine children, including a huge oil painting of Janet Jackson. "Hot? Burning, baby..." Jackson listens poker-faced to my apologies for being late and ushers me into his private office. "You have 15 minutes," he says.

On his office walls hang a few items of Michael Jackson memorabilia—the gold record for Thriller—next to several paintings of lions, for Jackson's astrological sign. The look is music-business power, but the sound is calm, unusual calm in light of the excitement and activity surrounding Jackson. Janet's album, Control, has been at the top of the charts all year and is about to burst upward again with the just-released title track single. And in a few days she'll be in the Olympia Auditorium in downtown L.A. shooting the album's fourth video before a screaming mob of mostly black and Hispanic teenagers.

A secretary sits outside, the phones hardly ring. Janet is in Japan doing a commercial, and Michael is in the studio with Quincy Jones finishing the long-awaited sequel to Thriller. But you cannot just start in with Joe Jackson, because he doesn't make you comfortable. He is a storm, it not altogether intimidating version of the Black muse, circa, where he broke his sons as the Jackson Five, and has been known to pursue a deal with the instincts of a shark and the wiles of a con man.

But sometimes he's landed in deep water. The complexity of managing a group as popular as the Jackson Five was overwhelming at times, and Michael's career became absolutely impossible. When his management contract with Michael ran out in 1983, Michael did not renew it. So for the past year, Michael has devoted himself to the Joe Jackson Dancers, a troupe of hot young international lovelies, and Patii Brooks, an older Casablanca Records disco star. He has also lent his name to a line of brandy and is marketing a soft drink called Je Cola. But this kind of hustling seems strange for Jackson. His main client is his daughter, and Janet Jackson's career has reached the top.

"We're the dog with the bone that all the other dogs are trying to get," barks Jackson. "And the pressure is always on you to hold onto what you've got."

What he's got is a showstopper. Just a few years ago, Janet's act was cute and bubblegum: Kind of trilly. Now, it's a well-rehearsed and choreographed potboiler, with Janet strutting and shaking her butt in the videos, while singing songs that are furiously sexual.

"She's of age," says Jackson. "But then, it's just an image. Janet isn't that way at home. She may think of herself as a little rebel, but she's still my daughter. She's always been just Janet Jackson to me."

In 1977 Norman Lear cast Janet as a wide-eyed, angelic-looking battered child on the sitcom Good Times after watching her on several Jackson Family television specials. She was a regular until two years later, when she moved on to Don't Tell Mom, where she played the sunny-talking Charlene. There were later moves to make. By the time she was 16, her father was shopping for a recording deal at A&M, although she had doubts about her readiness to enter the recording business. But Joe Jackson kept pushing. "I feel it," he told her. "You're ready. I can tell."

Jackson tries to take hold of my notes to read what I intend to ask him, but I tactfully manage to short-circuit his attempt. He is a proud, plainspoken man, who doesn't hesitate to claim his role in Janet's success. The last year has been an extended battle for control of Janet, the wily, tough, shrewd Joe Jackson is aligned against the smooth, young, market-oriented A&M Records executive John McClain, who is given a great share of the credit for Janet's breakthrough. Each of these forces is out to dispose the other. At times during the making of Control, the struggle generated such bitterness that the two went barely speaking. According to McClain, Jackson didn't want Janet to record with the power house writing/producing team of Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis, never heard the album until it was completed, didn't like the finished product when he first heard it, and didn't think it would sell.

"I'm not the type to jump into the media, but people know I'm the backbone of the Jackson family," says Jackson. "As for Janet, I was pushing her on stages in Vegas back when she was still a little girl."

Jackson doesn't look at me too often as he paces the floor. He is more intent on his own thoughts than my reactions.

"I've worked hard for my family," he asserts. "The problem comes, though, when others come in behind you and try to steal them away. Others tell them 'We can do this for you, we can do that.' But the wheels had already been set in motion for Janet Jackson, anyone who jumps on now will be getting a free ride. And I don't intend to let that happen."

By "anyone who jumps on now," Jackson may be referring to the 31-year-old McClain. More than a record company executive, McClain has been a close family friend of the Jacksons since 1968, when he attended the Walton Academy in Encino with several of the Jackson brothers.

"(When I was two,) Janet said, 'John used to change my diapers. He's like a son to my parents. I can talk to him for four and four hours straight on the phone and never get bored.' He's always been there for me."

The mention of McClain's name was a less than enthralled reaction from Joe Jackson. "I take nothing away from John McClain," he says evenly. "But he works for a record company and he gets paid to do what he's doing for Janet Jackson. He has no control over her. It's his not in business to have control over her. And no, he is not like a son to me. John McClain has his own daddy."

Jackson continues to pore, gazing by the window every so often to gaze at the impressive view of Los Angeles below.

"I have no favorites, be it Michael, Janet, or whomever," he reflects. "You have children that are more talented than others, but they're all yours. Even the ones with no talent. Katherine and I tried to develop the talent of all our children. They were trained hard and taught well. As parents, we wanted them to get all they deserved, and deserve all they got." Janet's Control album, says Jackson, is successful because it reflects her background. "She came out of a black situation. Those are her roots. You can stay black and still sell millions of records."

And bottom-line, according to Jackson, is that the family "is making money. If Janet listens to me and works a little harder, she'll be as big as Michael." It's starting to get dark. The lights of Los Angeles are glowing and Joe Jackson has been answering questions for close to an hour. "When you're in the public eye," he observes quietly, "your life is in the public domain. People read about you, they write about you. They draw their own conclusions. It would get more respect if the public knew the whole story, if they really looked at where the Jackson clan started and where it is today."

Jackson smiles and looks at me directly. "Others try to jump on the bandwagon," he says. "I am the bandwagon."

Janet drives up to the photo studio in her shiny black Mercedes-Benz 300 with her dog, Fluffy, and her production assistant, Jessica, and booties in all bright and bubbly like a chubby-cheeked Michael. "Janet drives really fast," says Jessica.

Like a bat out of hell," says her publicist, who's been waiting at the studio for them to arrive.

It's a murky, overcast day and we're in photographer Peter Langen's studio, a spiffy setup located between downtown L.A. and Koreatown in the kind of shabby neighborhood that makes you want to check your car periodically. But Janet seems unperturbed. She's cool and very self-possessed. And just barely turned 29. She's cutely pretty, not the womanly beauty of the videos. "I'd like to be as beautiful as Robbie and LaToya," she says. "They can walk out of the house wearing no makeup and look good. Me, I had a photographer tell me he wanted to shoot me with a 'natural' look. Just a little base, lipstick, and mascara. I looked at myself in the mirror and thought, 'Gawd, is that it? I mean, I'm not the last of the line.' I'm not ugly. I'm not gorgeous. I'm on the borderline. I just made it over... barely."

Janet's hair is tied up in ultrablack ringlets, and she is wearing red nail polish, ultrawhite socks, and stiletto lace-up shoes. Here, in the studio, she is trying to present a portrait of the private Janet Jackson, who worries about wearing control lenses like Whodunnit Goldfinger and Grace Jones. ("I look at them and go, 'Whoooooosooooo...'")

Archie Bell and the Drells' "Tighten Up" and Booker T. and the MGs' "Green Onions" blast from the tape deck. If Janet's worried about anything, it doesn't show.

"Don't you know any of these songs?" Pete Townshend asks, firing off shots.

"You talkin' to me?" she asks. "Nah." Janet gives off the kind of keep-your-distance signals that can chill any attempts at overfamiliarity. Townshend's assistants have laid out a nice spread of food: Chinese chicken salad, Kentucky fried Chicken, the obligatory Chinese and crackers, fruit, and Evan water. But while everyone else stunts his face over the course of the three-hour shoot, Janet doesn't eat much. Just an apple, an occasional grape.

She's one cool girl, this Janet Jackson. But, then, she can afford to be. When [Janet] was just baby, still living in a close-knit, protected family environment, her five older brothers—Michael, Jermaine, Jackie, Marlon, and Tito—formed one of the premier black pop groups in the country (the Jackson 5). Managed by their father, who was formerly a guitarist with a '60s soul group called the Falcons, the Jackson Five had the distinction of being able to come up with a hit record for Motown Records practically every three months: "I Want You Back," "ABC," "The Love You Save," "I'll Be There."

In March 1976, the group decided to leave Motown, citing a desire for more "creative control" in one of their reasons. It generated a slow-burn rift between Joe Jackson and Jermaine, who was named to Motown mogul Berry Gordy's daughter, Hazel. Jermaine elected to remain at the label.

"It's my blood that flows through his body," Joe Jackson said, "not Gordy's." Jackson doesn't seem to manage his oldest child, Robin Jackson, who scored a Top 20 pop urban hit in 1984 with the single "Control," which was produced by Michael. He does, however, oversee the careers of the Jacksons (with brother Randy), Janet, and his other daughter, 20-year-old LaToya, who sang on the "We Are the World" session and had a minor black radio hit just a few years back with "Heaven Don't Lie."

While all of his children have pursued music with varying degrees of luck, it is the highly successful Michael and the on-the-rise Janet who have emerged as the true stars of the family. Michael, for all his soft-spoken, gentle demeanor, is said to be fiercely competitive, acutely business-minded. It's rumored that part of the session his follow-up to "I Wanna Be Shaken" was delayed as he sat in town to have the charts with Janet's Control.

But the album shows no sign of expiring. Control was one of the ten best-selling albums of 1986. Three million people bought it. Frenzoidly hip and intensely autobiographical, as dance tracks made it one of the most exciting releases by a black artist since—dare I say it—Michael's Thriller. And despite all the prohibitions on the altar of crossover by many artists of color these days, Control's distinction is that it is as aggressively black. Funky, focused, and rhythmic, Control contained an extraordinary number of hit singles. It is clearly an expression of a woman defining her soul and declaring her freedom. At its center is the title song "Control," which can be taken as Janet's comment on the crisis that has forced her to leave her loyalties

"I'm not trying to pimp Janet or steal her away from her father," says John McClain, "but I have a clearer vibe on how to make her the queen of the music industry."

between McClain and her father. "When I was 17... I did what my father said... but that was long ago."

Seated across from me in an office at Turner's studios, McClain spells out its special significance. "When I listen to it, I hear someone who is very cocky, bold, straightforward, assertive."

"A pimp?" John McClain asks incredulously. "I'm not trying to pimp Janet Jackson or steal her away from her father [sighs Janet Jackson]. McClain says that he has, perhaps, gotten "too much credit" for the action Janet is currently receiving, but he did match her with Jimmy Iovine and Terry Lewis. Control, he emphasizes, is the result of hard work put in "by the A Team—myself, Janet, Jimmy, and Terry."

"I would have been scared if Joe Jackson had liked what we did, because I wasn't trying to get a 50-year-old audience. If I'm going to get these kids out here. And because I'm a lot younger than Joe Jackson, I have a clearer vibe on how to do that."

McClain is a smart and savvy young man who manages to convey confidence without seeming arrogant. He says he's enthusiastic about the reason of the time that will take place next year when the Norms Day-long show stars with Janet in a movie for which McClain has written the screenplay.

"I saw Prince's Under the Cherry Moon and thought it was too exotic," he says diplomatically. "Our movie will be more down-to-earth... and others." He calls the tour label and the Time will embark on next summer. "I expect it to be the concert of the year."

Janet's fans, he says, have only gotten a small taste of what she has to offer as a performing artist. "I've told her 'Let Whodunnit [Houston] and Patti [LaBelle] sing their lungs out. Just concentrate on being a female like Michael Jackson and you'll get the people something that's even more exciting.' After all, Luther Vandross is a better singer, but Michael's a bigger star because of the way he dances, because of his visual concepts."

McClain says it took him a long time to get Janet to break down and admit that she wanted to be as big a star as her brother. "When I talk to Janet," he allows, "I'm her father, her brother, her uncle. She trusts me. She felt guilty about admitting that she did feel competitive. She was scared that she'd try and fail. Well, Michael may not want her to be as big, but it's not for her to want it."

McClain was from a well-to-do family himself. He and Michael were close friends when they attended Walton Academy. "Tito and Jermaine never wanted to hang out with Michael, so I did," he says. Until recently, he notes, Joe Jackson had always made him feel like a member of the Jackson clan. While her father did get Janet her contract with A&M Records, McClain says, "Joe left Janet in my hands because he had a lot of other projects going. He gave me enough rope to hang myself." Instead, McClain proceeded to make Janet one of his special projects. He got her to diet and exercise, sent her to a vocal coach, and teamed her with choreographer Paula Abdul. He even picked out her clothes at Macys in West Hollywood and sent her to his hair stylist for a new look.

Initially, Janet earned only a modest level of achievement at the label. Her 1982 debut album, which contained the man-bite "Young Love," and her Giorgio Moroder-produced 1984 Dream Street album, both sold a respectable 200,000 units (Control, however, sold 250,000 copies in one week in July). After McClain had been at A&M for only six months, he received a highly lucrative offer to join MCA Records' black music division. "But I stayed at A&M because of Janet," and I didn't stay to see her sell just 200,000 units." Friction with Joe Jackson developed as Control became a blockbuster. "When an album sells 200,000 units it's a 'me' project, when it sells 3 million, it becomes a 'we' project."

Lately, McClain has acquired a mystique in the music industry as the Serequik who exerts total authority over Janet Jackson, even to the point of having coerced her into getting her divorce. McClain explains it differently: "People look at Janet as being weak, but she's tough. Yes, I did pry into her business a bit. I didn't think the marriage was a good move for her. Even her brothers weren't crazy about it. But nobody slammed me for having too much influence over Janet until she started selling a lot of records. She and I were close even back when she wasn't selling any."

McClain says his aim is to make her the "queen of the music industry. It's been a challenge just to bring her to this level; people told me I'd never be able to do it. But Janet has so much potential. She's got cards she hasn't even shown yet."

Clad in a furry black tuxedo jacket and tight black pants, Janet relentlessly chews on a wad of gum and chooses her words carefully. "To be honest, I didn't know all of that was in me." While Michael did contribute a lot of production and to her modestly successful 1984 LP Dream Street, he had no input on Control. Janet spent two months in Minneapolis working on it with Jan and Lewis, and Michael didn't hear any of the tracks until the LP was completed. "I wanted this album to be my success, not my family's," she said. "And Jimmy and Terry helped me get it."

Jan and Lewis, former members of the Time, knew what works. Chicago, the Time came storming at you in funky punk suits, arrogant motherfuckers, grabbing their catclashes and preening like peacocks with their jet-collared dō's. The Time was just at you.

"I saw the Time in concert back when I was 16. It was in Chicago, and they were great. And soooooo nasty. I was sitting out in the audience next to my Mom, and I got so embarrassed that I had to move a few seats away from her.

Before they could finish with Janet, the stylishly lewd duo had subdivided the tracks of Control to Sharon Bryant, the former lead singer of the R&B pop group Atlantic Star, who, fortunately for Janet, decided the disco talk that nambamouth a sound on her solo recordings. Talk about bad career moves.

"Sharon just wanted a different feeling, I guess, so Jimmy and Terry wrote the 'Time' song storming at you. What you hear on the album is the result of a lot of jamming that they did right there in the studio. All the music is pretty much there. But the lyrics, the vocal arrangements, the keyboards and synthesizers, that's where I came in."

Most of Control's power is in its dance floor authority, from the initial hit, "What Have You Done for Me Lately," and "Nasty," to the more precisely sublime "When I Think of You" (the single that made Janet and her brother Michael the first siblings to earn solo No. 1 pop hits). Her second company, A&M, fully expects it to reach the $5 or 6 million mark—which would put her squarely in Whitney Houston territory.

While Janet's power in what she achieved on the album is obvious, her voice contains few enthusiastic reflections, and her direct gaze remains hard to read. It's no accident that Control is the name of her album, since that's how Janet seems to want to appear, worldly, tightly in control, capable of resisting all manipulation.

Janet's act was cute and bubblegum. Now, it's a patbailer, with Janet strutting and shaking her butt and singing songs that are furiously sexual.

"A lot of people look at my smile and think of me as innocent and shy," admits Janet. "Now, people are finally starting to look at me as an adult." Janet cracks her knuckles. With her foot resting casually on the footrest of my chair, she has a sassy little "ask me anything, I dare you" smile on her face. One of the first defiantly adult things Janet ever did was to weed dreamy—sired, ponytailed James DeBarge, a member of the singing group DeBarge. Her brother Jermaine had discovered DeBarge back when the Grand Rapids, Michigan, quartet was recording for a small gospel label and brought them to Motown. For a while DeBarge seemed destined to become the label's answer to the departed Jackson Five. While they didn't live up to that promise, DeBarge did build a solid reputation on the strength of its creamy, jolletto-based R&B sound.

"I met James when I was 10 and he was 13," Janet says wistfully. "We'd talk on the phone all the time. He had this sweet, affectionate personality and we became best friends. Later we became more than friends." Janet languidly chews her gum as she explains, "I always had more male friends than female friends. I just got along better with guys. But when James and I started going together, I gave up all my male friends."

James had, which everyone does, certain problems. That's what made me grow closer to him. I wanted to help him. "The young couple got married at a ceremony that none of her family attended." I came home the next day to tell my parents what I'd done. Before I could even get to the door, James and I took care of my father met with the news. "Seven months later, she announced that she had decided to have the marriage annulled. A cast member of the TV show Fame at the time of her wedding, Janet blames an intense work schedule for her decision to end the marriage.

"When I'd finally get home at night, I'd be so tired James would want to work with me on song ideas—we used to write together—and I just wouldn't feel like it." Janet realizes that most people would consider a bit assembly ("selfish, really," she admits) to divorce someone simply because you didn't have enough time to spend with them. "But I was never with James the way I wanted to be with him. And I just wasn't happy living that way." Her plaintive tone of voice is the final break in the armor of cool she's worn all afternoon.

James reportedly has said he's "confused about the whole situation," and may not think she gave their marriage enough of a chance.

"He might not think so, but I know I did. And it really hurt to get the annulment. I was in shock when I did it. I cried, he cried. But we've tried to stay friends. We go to the movies, and that feels weird: sitting there next to somebody you used to be married to." She mentions they're both dating other people, and to her that's a healthy sign.

"He'll get over it," Janet says, picking at one of her short tigmagmas. "I mean, he must be getting over it if he's dating."

Little seems to concern Janet as much as how people regard her decision to divorce James DeBarge. While not defensive, she does project an intense need to set the record about others' feelings toward him. And while she doesn't mention it, it does look like the person Janet became when she emerged from her marriage is the sexy, self-assured Janet Jackson the world sees today. Though they have long since crossed being a couple, rumors and innuendos about their relationship persist. Not just among her fans and the media, but among her show business peers as well.

"I saw Vanity recently, and she said, 'Hey, I heard you had Janet's baby.' I told her that was old news. Then there are the stories that I was pregnant when we got married but had an abortion. A few months ago this guy stopped me on the street to say he heard I'd really had my baby over in Europe and was going to come ready to sue it for me." A mild expression of disgust passes over her face. "Gawd, so stupid. Somebody ought to write a book about the whole thing."

Like her brother, Janet is plagued by rumors. And while others may not understand his penchant for plastic surgery and sneaking in a superbant canister of Janet, at least he's made his own name on what motivates him. "Michael says that out of any two people in our family, we're the ones who think the most alike. I probably understand him better than anyone else does. Certain things he does, others may wonder why. ... But I know why. Of course," she says, in cool command once again, "that doesn't mean I'll tell why."

"Don't cry and moan about what people say about you. Or you can channel that energy into your art. Really, it just makes you stronger."

Rebbie Jackson delicately nibbles at just the center of her quiche and takes only one or two ladylike sips of champagne. "I want to keep a clean head," she jokes. "I don't want to say too much."

Rebbie was 13 when Janet was born. "Soon after, their mother, Katherine, decided to go to night school to earn her high school diploma. "She had polio when she was young," explains Rebbie. "And she quit school when she was a teenager." By dad, Katherine Jackson worked at a Sears department store (back in the Jackson Five's pre-fame days, in the 1960s, she took care of Janet when she was a baby). Rebbie smiles. "So I think she's an anne. Other people are surprised at what she's accomplished, but I could have predicted it. What with her divorce, this level of success has been a shot in the arm for Janet."

Whereas Katherine, Rebbie, and Michael are Jehovah's Witnesses, Janet is not, although she says, "I do study once in a while with Rebbie. Sometimes I'll pick up a book of Bible stories. To get a point across to someone, I may refer to something I've read. But I'm not a religious person. My mother doesn't try to force me into it. She wants something like that to be my decision."

While Katherine Jackson has had little luck in influencing Janet's theological leanings, she did manage to talk her into moving back home after her divorce. "I wanted to get a smaller place of my own. Maybe a condo," she admits. "But my mother would call me and say, 'If you're lonely, your room will always be here.' Finally, I just said OK, because I could tell she missed having me around."

Without warning, Janet grabs my notepad from my lap to see what I've been writing about her. "Gawd, what is this— shorthand? And you can write on each line. I'd have to skip lines to write like this."

"That's because you don't do it for a living," I say a tad haughty, and Janet giggles.

I don't want to rule the world
I just want to run my life
So make your life a little easier
When you get the chance

—"Control"

Minions, I'm starting to get tired," Janet sighs. She smiles, her expression aly. "You know, I can't sleep alone. At night I have to sleep with somebody or something."

"Yeah, I know. I've read that about you."

"This is what I sleep with." Her toe gently nudges fluffy, the napping peach on the floor between us that she had rescued from Rainbow Park in Encino.

John McCloin of A&M Records has acquired a mystique in the music industry as the Svengoli who controls Janet Jackson, who even coerced her into getting a divorce.

"Some people just dumped her out the back of a van and drove off." As for companions of the two-legged variety, Janet is much more selective. "I don't have many friends. I've been hurt a lot in the past. People use me to get close to my brothers and sisters, and that hurts like crazy."

What Janet wants now and is determined to get is control of her own life. There is a special person in her life ("His name is Rene") and she calls him very supportive. "When I got the annulment from James, Rene was one of the first people I called. I told him, 'I don't believe what I've just done.' But really, having a boyfriend and a career would be too hard right now. I have to watch myself and make sure I don't get too wrapped up." She gives a little laugh. "That would be serious trouble." That wistful little ballad from Control called "Let's Wait Awhile" perhaps summarizes Janet's attitude about relationships these days. "Being married feels different from just living with someone. James and I both wanted our careers, so the marriage would've ended sooner or later. But look what came out of it. I hear he's back in the studio, working on some new stuff. And I have my album, which did well for me."

Janet seems amazingly untroubled by all the forces competing to control her actions and her destiny. Others may be bent on making her The Next Big Thing in the industry, but Janet, at least today, looks blissfully undisturbed.

"James used to call me lazy," she laughs. "I think he was right."

She smiles, gives a small sigh, and I feel like telling her that maintaining control over one's own life is no small feat, is, in fact, one of the toughest things that a person, let alone a long-buffered and protected 20-year-old, can do.

UNDER THE VOLCANOS

Volcano Suns are the most ass-kicking trio in America. Oh, those nifty boys.

Article by Byron Coley

Photography by Paul Robicheau

It was sorta like a dream. I was walking down a street in Boston. A gaggle of young girls was gathered about a half block up the street. As I got closer I could hear them laughing and see them jostling each other, vying to get peeks of something through a large window. As I drew near their voices became distinct.

Girl One: No! It looks like a hot loaf of bread.
Girl Two: Nah-uh! A shoebox!
Inside the window there was a long counter behind the counter, copying machines of all varieties were throbbing, but they were invisible to the young eyes around me. All they saw was the young man who worked there, his elbows resting on the countertop. His shirt was of a vaguely Samoan motif in a variety of dull browns, and perched above it was a hancut that did kinda look like a shoebox. Underneath this bizarre confluence loomed one of the finest hoods of a drummer that this city has produced in a long time. His name is Peter Prescott. His band is the Volcano Suns.

The Suns recently released their second album, All Night Lotus Party (Homebased), and it's more fun than nubby badminton. My idea of near-heaven. It is also possessed of enough mental drive to make the Suns the most ass-kicking trio in America. If this means I'm calling 'em better than ZZ Top (too old), Husker Du (too lev), Fishbone (too young), the Meat Puppets (too enclosed), and Angel (too arseous), so be it.

Who's your barber?

Prescott: Nick at Nick's Barbershop in Allston.

Do you have a name for that?

Prescott: For what?

That hancut. Is it your own invention, or is it something Nick came up with?

Prescott: Plenty of people have hair like this.

Oh yeah? Where?

Prescott: Uh, New Bedford.

The Volcano Suns were actually formed some 50 miles north of New Bedford, in the Greater Boston area, in the spring of 1984. At that time, Prescott headed a couple of members from a nascent combo called Disneyland after auditioning for that band's drum position. It had been a couple of years since his last band, Mission of Burma, had ceased to exist, and Prescott had a yen to get a new thing going. Something that would be as aggressive as the very aggressive Burma, but also with "a sort of goody edge." Pete's other desire was to "drop melodies smack-dab in the middle of chaos." The Suns seem to have achieved these stated goals and then some.

The original trio lasted only a few months, but the current lineup (with Jon Williams on guitar and Jeff Wingard on bass) has been together since the fall of '84. In that time they've gone from being a velocity anaerobic, govt-kill throw-monster to a band that rocks in a thoroughly boss and unpredictable way. With his face bulging like a squeeze toy beneath his broad-loaf do, Pete tosses out unlikely combinations of rolls and thumps, bellowing like a raging newsstander all the while. In the past few months, Jeff and Jon seem to have gotten some pumping beans stuck in their britches as well, moving through all manner of govtus tongue-in-check rock-poses. This sorta completes their visual package, as it were.

Prescott's drumming has a tendency to be wiggly, so Jeff's bass has always been the solidly there, pulse-maker on which the band cavors. Jon's noise-sheet guitar playing comes at you with a kind of solidity that has nothing to do with Joe Perry. This alone would distinguish him from his Boston brethren, but he also compensates up the wall that adds beef-density to Prescott's highly melodic tubelensism. Toss in whooping lead vocals by Pete and additional mouth-highlights by the Twins (Buildups of Love [Jon and Jeff's official non-de-band]), and you've got a sound that is crudely holistic and unmistakable.

Are there any other copy professionals in the band? Prescott: I don't think Jeff or Jon has ever laid a finger on a Xerox machine. That must make it tough to communicate sometimes. Prescott: They have a different perspective, yeah. I have anger in my blood, so to speak. Do the sounds of printing machines ever suggest songs to you? Prescott: No. Well, maybe subliminally they suggest messages. I don't know, but most of the songs on the first record were just written about hating the scene in Boston.

The Suns recorded their first album, The Bright Orange Years, in the fall of '84 as a demo for Hi-Fi/Real. They played quite a bit around Boston, but found surprisingly little support. A hard-core cadre of sinners has been entranced by the band's outburst. That may be the first, but most of the anthemic college kids who make up Boston's after-dark population have been under the thrall of the various roots-dork bands that sprang up in the wake of the Del Fuegos. Furthermore, Boston's pen jockeys seem unable to categorize the band as anything other than "that ex-Mission of Burma dude and a couple of jokers." Add to this the Suns' apparent inability to ass-less, and it becomes obvious that the Suns will have to make it on sheer talent.

Surely there is no better way to judge a band's talent than by the covers it chooses to do. Two of the tunes they've selected are particularly emblematic of their brain-lever. The first is "Baba Rags" — an obvious bit of post-hippie fluff first recorded by Leonard Nimoy on one of his thoroughly obscure Dot LPs, the second is "Duck, Fight and Fuck" — an obscure piece of post-1960s New Hampshire's insane bike-messenger, G.G. Allen. And if the mere selection of these tunes wasn't enough, the Suns also do justice to both of 'em. When they shared a bill with G.G. in Chicago, they were too "shy" to play "Duck & Fuck." But they do the tune even better than the Scumbags (G.G.'s band), and that's my solemn vow. Interestingly, "Duck & Fuck" seems to be one of the songs that's finally getting the Suns across to the dull-witted persons of Boston.

The Suns are at least as goofy as Prescott hoped they'd be. When picking a title for the second album, they went through hundreds. One day it would be Volcano Suns. Another: Put. Next day it was Nature in the Raw, or Born Alive, or Shoring The Purple Helix (a New Bedford slang term for jerking off). Still, All Night (also: Party) ended up with the name it has now, and it's the sort of record you can play for people who like good stuff.

More stretched-out than The Bright Orange Years, Joan Party bends and twists around in all sorts of loopy ways that suggest the Suns are power-drinking toward all kinds of new stylistic turf. Prescott even suggests they're interested in doing "soundtracktype work." In fact, the Suns don't seem to distance outright any kind of work.

"Jeff and Jon have never laid a finger on a Xerox machine. I have toner in my blood, so to speak."

Any truth to the rumor that you and Thurston Moore (another open-shop professional whom Suns' Mouth's not touring) are writing a collaborative rock opera about copy shops?

Prescott: No, although we talked about doing a single with Sonic Youth — them on one side and us on the other — where each band would be doing a cover selected by the other one. We picked "American Pie" for them, but the project never really got going. The opera's not a bad idea though. I'd have to get in touch with them. At one point Jeff and Jon were very serious about wanting to do a rock opera about Evel Knievel. Those guys, especially Jon, have a very unhealthy obsession with Evel Knievel. — Jim, Tom Jones, Mr. T., Mark Spitz.

I look up from my cheeseburger to see if Prescott's smoking, but he's got a serious, reflective look on his face. I stare at him inquiringly, but he doesn't crack a smile. That guy. What a joker. I guess with a haircut like his, you'd have to be.

The Volcano Suns: JJ-Peter Prescott, Jeff Weigand, and Jon Williams, practice the Lotus position.

STILL MBAQANGA AFTER ALL THESE YEARS

For 20 years, Paul Simon whined and kvetched about the same things. Then he went to Africa and finally had fun. But he broke the UN cultural boycott in the process. He has a lot of explaining to do.

There is this guy, call him Goodman, because that's what he sounds like. Here is what he sounds like on a tune called "Embojengo Womculo": ow ow ow ow ow ow. He is howlin' Woll as pedagogue, a patient, preacherly voice moaning out a Zulu rap about the universality of music, how it has no beginning or end. Like that.

There is the other guy, Paul Simon. He doesn't sound anything like a goatsman, he doesn't sound bluesy, not tortured, not low. When Simon brought some of Goodman's candidates to New York from Soweto last year to record the new Graceland album, upon arrival one of them asked where he had to go to register with the police. Simon had a lot of explaining to do. Graceland is for the most part a record of South African rhythm tracks, bouncing underneath the kind of soul you've heard Simon talk about before. And in exactly that Simon voice, somebody I asked for pre-interview advice just said, "Ask, 'why did you sing on the album?'" This is not, however, why Simon has been doing a lot of explaining since Graceland came out.

I always hated Paul Simon. He put enough cheek into the postmod urban despair of the '70s to give a lot of people the excuse they were looking for to feel good about feeling bad. Self-absorbed, seemingly comfy in his exile instead of trying to blowtorch it out of his heart—God, what a target. Still like "My Little Town" and "50 Ways to Leave Your Lover" and the paper worship of singer-songwriter geniuses. And there's that milk-chuke voice. Where's the backbone?

Are you a Mets fan or a Yankee fan?

I'm both. I grew up being a Yankee fan, but I root for the Mets in the National League.

Oh yeah, sure?

Here's why Simon is explaining Graceland so much these days. In South Africa, it is easy to find the "township jive" that he loves and puts forth on Graceland, it's on the radio far more frequently in many areas than, say, Michael Jackson or Run-D.M.C. The apartheid regime finds it useful to promote this raucous music, with its cheerful descriptions and parables of township life, which supports the government's idea of what simple, happy people the "homeland" dwellers are. American black rock and pop, which might suggest an international black heritage and unity, are restricted by the government-controlled South African Broadcasting Corporation. The day "Dancing on the Ceiling" is blasting through the South African streets may only be the day they'll be dancing in the streets, on the ceiling, on the bones of the regime.

Apartheid aggressively monitors pop music. While certain cuts from Simon's album get played freely in South Africa, other interracial efforts aren't always permitted. (Big exception, "Ebony and Ivory," which went No. 1.) Two members of the South African reggae band Scratch were imprisoned for four years behind bars in 1983 for "undirectly further[ing] the aims of the African National Congress," from the stage they had called for the release of Nelson Mandela. It is illegal, of course, to play the Special A.K.A.'s "Free Nelson Mandela."

There are some important objections to weigh in thinking about the pleasures of pre-

Besides, wearing, at least for the moment, the regime's seal of approval, it doesn't much benefit the black musicians who make it. Sales abroad finance the white-controlled music industry, royalties to blacks are rare. Sipho Mhoxa Mabasa, one of the musicians thanked on Graceland, had his equipment destroyed by anti-apartheid activists last year for collaborating with the music industry at a "People's Concern."

But then, there are the gifts of Goodman to weigh, too. And more important, some form of unity has been forged by this thumping, clattery pop music. It's shaping an audience, even generating a kind of dogged black music industry. These bonds may not always be to the regime's tastes.

This music, well, it's, for sure, even though the musicians won't see any money, and even though the government enforces its Sunday Observance Law (no work on Sunday), which along with work-week jobs ensures that recordings are done after hours or illegally. It will continue until the carpet is pulled on."

Fall Simon's apartment-longer-stayed office in the Tilt Building in Manhattan is filled with marmalade—a giant photo of Johnny Ace blows up from a porno pic Simon sent away for as a kid; guitar artifacts dating back to his fun and merry days here're stashed on shelves; still life on the wall features a pair of sneakers he bought in Hawaii. What I first take for nervous poses in the conversation are, in fact, meaningful. When a guy who's been married since you were 16, he's not a virgin singer-songwriter. He listens attentively and truly likes to talk—after the interview he gestures for me to stay and chat about SPIN, Mano Cubano, making another movie, and the California Angels. He doesn't try to dick me with his star power, he's smart, friendly, pleasant. And he makes it so clear that if not a good artist, he talks to too many people—because then you can talk to him so much.

You've said that give reminds you of '50s rock 'n' roll.

Yeah, a little bit. That's the best explanation I can come up with for some intuitive and emotional feeling. It does sound like that, and I do like that music, and am able to relate to it, but there's some other inexplicable thing in it, too. So I just want to leave it as "quasi-'50s rock 'n' roll." There's something else in there, but I don't know what it is. Tell me about some '50s rock 'n' roll that's influenced you. Sam Cooke?

A big influence: First, I think Sam Cooke was the best voice. I don't think anybody was in Sam Cooke's league. And he also tended to be more of a soft singer and phaser, so there was more for me to learn because that's what my voice is naturally. Although he could belt too, essentially for me it was the smoothness of his voice. I was a big Sam Cooke fan.

lin, still are, even more for his work with the Soul Sisters than for his pop stuff.

Yeah, Elvis was there. He was the most important name in rock 'n' roll, no question about it. Nobody even close. It was his invention, he blended black and white music, and that's the single most powerful idea that's emerged from rock 'n' roll. Plus he had the voice, a great instrument!

Other stuff: The Everly Brothers, too—wouldn't have been a Simon and Garfunkel without the Everly Brothers. Doo wop groups, we sang in doo wop groups when we were kids. We learned about singing all the three different parts, from bass to falsetto. I still do that on all my records, still put in all the background vocals myself.

"I don't think the boycott was intended to block black South Africans from the international music community."

Tell me about the song "Craceland," which has a metaphor of a car trip through the South to Elvin's home. It sounds like the trip is a real report. What was it like to go to Craceland?

Just as in the song, the journey was more interesting than the destination. The drive up the Mississippi Delta is very beautiful. I had been recording for this album with Rockin' Dimples in Louisiana. I rented a car and drove up. It was very beautiful—Louisiana, the rural South—and I hadn't been there in a long time.

But Graceland itself was just a business. Big parking lots, you buy your ticket, get on a bus, and wait in line. There's a tour, indeed, and they take you through the house and show you Elvis's this and Elvis's that. It's a very common experience. But nevertheless, at the end, you come out onto the grounds and there are the graves of his mother, his father, and him. Even though it's so commercial, you could even feel it different to your taste—and then, on the plaque on Presley's grave, it says he was given the gift of this incredible voice that has troughed millions of people all around the world

And that's just what it is. A gift.

You heard a tape of jazz and wanted, you have said, to go to South Africa to find out who the musicians were and how they lived. Who were they?

They are a mixed group. Some of them were players who lived in Soweto and who were part of popular bands there. Those are the guys I worked with most and those are the guys I brought back to New York to record and to perform on television. Some of the groups come from small, out-of-the-way towns. Too Ee Mabeleke and General M.D. Shunda, not really well-known groups, who play a mix of traditional music and Mabeleke plays in a soho style of music. General plays Shangaan style for the most part they don't speak any English, so I didn't get to know them like I did the guys from Soweto, who did speak English and were much more aware of American music. And who had more of a typical musician's chops, unlike General and Too. Then there's Ladyship Black Mambaaz, just this fantastic sounding group. Tell me about them: a Zulu gospel group, obviously all spirit, not at all like 350 rhythm and blues. Did they express any repudiation about working with a "hard" pop musician, among their sacred with your religion?

Ntu, because they have done that before. They have sung in English; they have many records out. They must have 20, 25 albums. They are a church group—the leader, Joseph Shabalala, is a renowned. They come from the township of Ladysmith, near Durban. They are Zulu. Joseph handles all the choreography.

It's very much like storytelling. It's very intimate and all the songs have choreography. They all dance in unison in very interesting movements. Joseph writes songs about what happens in his life every day. He carries a notebook with him always. He writes phrases and thoughts, and he tends to write songs pretty constantly, and they are what happened to him that day and week.

Tell me about the revolutions you had about making the rap. You were, by the book, breaking the laws of the UN's international cultural boycott of South Africa.

The only reservations I had were that I didn't want this trip to be misconstrued, to be thought in any way to be in support of the policies of the government of South Africa. I wasn't going to perform, so in that sense I thought it was within the guidelines of the cultural boycott, although technically I wasn't, as it turned out.

I don't think the boycott was intended to block black South African musicians from access to the international music community. I think it was to block the white, discriminating community there from outside nourishment. Whether that is an effective means of bringing about social change remains to be seen. But I certainly support the cultural boycott as a means for the artistic community to express moral outrage. But on the other hand, the de facto black musicians union over there is very frustrated at not being able to get their music heard in the world community. They felt they were the victims of a double apartheid, where they were being repressed at home, and then when they were trying to get their music outside, people were resistant to it because they were South African. They just felt that with me, having access to world markets because of being well known, they could get attention.

Don't you think it further confused the issue of your stance on apartheid to do a duet with Linda Ronstadt, who played Sun City?

PUBLIC NOTICE

It has been suggested, by a nameless enemy, that our sole reason for soliciting subscriptions is mercenary. That we "want the money." Heinous slander! Industrial sabotage! Our enemies will stop at nothing.

As they fatten themselves in expensive French and Italian restaurants, we work steadily, stoically, determinedly through the night to produce the best music magazine in America. Sure we suffer casualties. The collapse of editors, writers, and graphic artists from hunger and exhaustion is something we live with. We accept. For we are dedicated. Our goal is for SPIN to be Number One, the best. No hardship is too hard to sustain in our fight against the madonnas, the bands, the chewed-it's-tasteless morsel of boring-to-begin-with editorial offered elsewhere. We work till we drop, and when we drop, we get up, take a mouthful of someone's cold hamburger (or someone, if that someone has also dropped) and we continue.

And then this, this unholy accusation. There are reasons—good, strong, American reasons—for subscribing to SPIN, but that we stoop so low as to beg for money—no, this has never been one of them. For one thing, why should we lose nearly 20 percent of a possible year's income by encouraging you to subscribe at the ineptly inefficient price of $70 a year? Do we seem like idiots?

But good, rational argument is academic now. The result to our integrity has been made and we felt we had no other option but to address the matter openly. Yes, you can subscribe. Yes, your check will help us clear a few checks to the necessary suppliers. Yes, in return you will receive a mint condition SPIN every month before copies hit the newsstand and are soiled by all those cheap bastards who cop a free read and put the dog-eared copy back. Yes, you will be able to remove from your life the needless anxiety of wondering if you will miss your copy. Yes, you will constantly live on the thrilling cutting edge of music, knowing what others only pretend to know, able to laugh at the people you despise and attract the people you desire. Yes. Yes. Yes. Yes.

[Overcome with grief, and perhaps hunger, the copywriter was unable to complete this ad. Please help us help him. Subscribe. You won't be sorry. If you are, we'll refund you the remainder of the cost of your subscription. ALL THE KING'S MEN

It's dangerous to underestimate Dan King.

High up in the Las Vegas-Hilton Hotel, Don King sits in his suite sipping orange juice. He had gotten out of bed just a few minutes before. His famous logo, his hair, stands up in defiance, a coif that would make Billy Idol drool with envy. The phones ring incessantly, but King isn't answering.

Twenty-eight stories below, in the lobby of the hotel, the check-in desk is a maelstrom of fighters, ex-fighters, promoters, managers, hookers, and movie stars. The vigil has begun for what the culture of the next century might look back on as some heathen ritual—the heavyweight title fight.

Silence is not one of King's many gifts, but now he sits quietly, staring out at the mountains that ring Las Vegas, a magnificent backdrop in the purple haze of the desert's morning heat. He can afford to relax for a while. The fight is sold out, a $2 million live gate. What's more, he's firmly in control of the skin racket again, the architect of a hot tournament that will unify the heavyweight title, the man with the action.

The minutes of silence seem like hours as King sits pensively. One wonders, could he be thinking how this whole thing started? A ragged, spindly kid running numbers in Cleveland becomes king of the racket. A bloody fistfight in the street ends in the accidental death of his antagonist. A manslaughter conviction and four years in prison. The pardon by the governor many years later. A meteoric rise as a boxing promoter. Hounded by the FBI and IRS for ten years. Indicted on 24 counts of tax evasion and facing a maximum of 46 years in prison, a grim future for a 54-year-old man, he is finally acquitted by a jury on all counts.

"I'm moving on Hollywood now!" shouts King. "I've already opened offices there. I'm going to make movies. I want to be the black Louis B. Mayer. I have my own sports TV network. Our fights are syndicated throughout the world. I've promoted 150 world's title fights and have a fantastic film library. Film libraries are becoming a big thing. I haven't outgrown boxing, but I do have other ambitions. I want to be a billionaire."

"How rich are you now?"

"That's all relative. By some people's standards I'm very rich. Listen, if you can count it, you haven't got enough. But in big business, it doesn't matter how much you're worth. It's how much money you have around you. Associating with billionaires on a day-to-day basis, being with them and their families. I'm the godfather of a billionaire's daughter, Meshulam Riklis and Pia Zadora's little girl, Katy.

"I'm very friendly with Kirk Kerkorian, who picked up a billion and a quarter in profits when he sold his stock and his MGM hotel in Las Vegas. Then there's Ken Berg of American Enterprises. He's now the largest stockholder in American Can. They're all good friends, and they take a deep interest in whatever I'm doing.

"I was supposed to have a 15-minute audience with Rupert Murdoch, one of the prime movers in this country. It lasted over three hours, and I put Mr. Murdoch in the numbers business, so to speak. I instigated the Lotto contest he now runs in his New York Post."

When King first crashed the big-time fight business, he was regarded as some strange phenomenon. He knew very little about the business end of the sport. The two-syllable light huggins looked at him in bewilderment as he quoted Shakespeare and Khalil Gibran. They thought they had a quiet until they sat down at the table over figures. Then there was no more flowery talk. It was all hardball until King won.

In the fight racket, the books on King are balanced. Fifty percent like doing business with him and 50 percent hate him, but the sides keep changing. The "lins" can be out the next day, and the "outs" can be in if they have something King wants.

The outs tell you that King doesn't live up to the letter of his contracts, that he's a publicity nut who steals the limelight from the fighters, that he manipulates boxing commissions, that his dynasty has an under stranglehold on the sport. Then they'll say, "But don't quote me," because the outs could be his own right, and then they'll tell you what a generous guy he is.

The lausent from some of the fighters under the King dynasty has been loud and loud. Former heavyweight champion Larry Holmes claims he was like a man in bonds for all those years King had him tied up under contract. But since Holmes earned some $40 million under the King banner, it was a gift-edged bondage.

King has so many fighters in his stable he can't keep most of them busy enough to make any real money.

In the fight racket, the books on King are balanced: 50 percent like doing business with him and 50 percent hate him. But the sides keep changing.

but if one of them signs for an outside bout, King was indeed okay for breach of contract, because, if nothing else, King protects his interests.

By 9:30 that evening the fight is history and not many are disturbed over the decision, which went to Michael Spinks, although the naive and disingenuous Larry Holmes made what many thought was a successful bid to regain his title. The festivities are continuing at a post-fight party being thrown by King, the Hilton Hotel chain boss, and the boss himself, Baron Hilton. But King is the star among the commotion he has invited to the fight. There's Whoopi Goldberg whooping it up at one table, Sly Stallone surrounded by his bodyguards, Don Johnson in his Miami Vice costume, Robert McElrath, who has been hanging around for days, Chuck Norris in drag, several members of Michael Jackson's family, but no Michael; and, among others, a silver-haired, disheveled-looking Tony Curtis.

King hops around from table to table when he isn't dancing. I ask Baron Hilton what he thinks of the evening. "It's a great night," he says. "Don King sold out the fight, a $2 million gate, and he sold out my hotel, all 1,314 rooms. That makes me very happy."

When you make Baron Hilton happy, it's good for the pocketbook. Above the music one can hear King's Wagmanian laugh.

On Sunday, King, his son Carl, who manages fighters, and I take the red-eye to Chicago where we change planes for Cleveland. A limousine waits at the airport driven by the once formidable heavyweight Earnie Shavers, who now runs King's fight camp near his estate. Sixty miles west of Cleveland, King's 180-acre spread is surrounded by an electrified gate. The house is worth $5 million, he says, and he thinks it has 23 rooms, but he isn't sure.

"You want to see a $200,000 bathroom," he asks. And how could I pass up the chance? Later, sitting in the master living room over a couple of scotch and sodas, I ask about the Jackson Five tour, which King inaugurated with Pepsi-Cola as the sponsor, only to get squeezed out.

"Wait a minute! I wasn't squeezed out. It was a marvelous experience. It was a financial success, and now it's water under the bridge. I don't want to have to go over all that crap again. Besides, who cares. It's long over with."

"How about the $15 million commercial deal Michael made to do Pepsi commercials?"

"Incredible. That's my kind of money. You know something, when I first brought Pepsi-Cola into the deal, the Jacksons weren't happy with Pepsi. Now they go behind my back to my contact and pull off this deal. But good luck to them."

Two years ago, as King was talking bold, new steps, the specter of prison walls loomed as it did 20 years ago. He was indicted for tax fraud. The charge: that he had been drawing some of his profits from Regan's Caesar's Palace boxing promotions from the gambling casino's cage and did not pay taxes on it. The betting was that he would be convicted. Had he come full circle?

"I'm free and clear as a bird now," King says, pointing the cologne stick. "But if I didn't have the

The message from Solomon Burke is: If you got yourself somebody, hold on to what you got and don't try to get no more.

EVERYBODY NEEDS SOMEBODY TO LOVE

Article by Scott Cohen

Photograph by Mark Sorloth

I'm so happy to be here tonight, and once again I'm glad to be in your wonderful city. Hello, New York. And I got a little message for you from somebody whose songs you've known a long time, who may even have changed your life. I'm talking about a gentleman who's become a legend in his own time, somebody considered by many a master showman, an impassioned raconteur, the greatest and most charismatic soul singer of all time, an entrepreneur who sold ice water and sandwiches on his tour bus between dates and popcorn and pork chops on the pavement outside the Apollo between shows. I'm referring to the Bishop of Soul, an ordained minister whose grandmother, 12 years before he was born, dreamed about him, which led her to found a church, Solomon's Temple: The House of God for All People; later known as the Church of Let It All Hang Out), someone who delivered his first sermon when he was 7, was nicknamed the Wonder Boy Preacher at age 9, led spiritual crusades by 12, and, at the height of his career, wore a gold lamé tuxedo with a gold cummerbund while preaching "God, money, and women" to a congregation of pretty broads. Someone whose grandmother, right before she died in December 1954, gave him a guitar for Christmas and made a prophecy that began to unfold in 1955, when he was discovered at a local talent contest by a top Philadelphia DJ who introduced him to the owner of the Apollo record label and had a big hit with "You Can Run (But You Can't Hide)," cowritten by ex-heavyweight champion Joe Louis.

I'm talking about none other than the King, Solomon Burke, Dr. Solomon Burke, who one summer in the late 1950s, after quitting the music business because he thought his manager and record company were ripping him off, asked a guy standing on the corner of 14th and Rittenhouse in Philadelphia for half a buck, which the man tossed and landed on a sewer grate. So Solomon Burke, the King of Soul, who James Brown once offered $10,000 to take off his crown and put it on Brown, got down on his hands and knees and attempted to pick it up without dragging it down the sewer, but a voice inside him said, "If you pick up that 50 cents now, you'll be picking up change for the rest of your life," and he kicked the money down the sewer, which made the man very mad, and he chased Solomon, who ran into the street and got hit by a car, which was driven by a woman whose niece Solomon had been dating. The woman took him home with her, and after that, he went to school and became a mortician, and that's how Solomon Burke became a Doctor of Mortuary Science, with an empire of funeral homes. A few years later, Babe Shivan, intent on ensnaring him, inappropriately parked a red Lincoln in front of Solomon's funeral home and wouldn't move it until he agreed to make a few records—with Atlantic—which included some big hits like "Out Out of Reach," "The Price," "Cry to Me," and "The Word."

There are three words that mean a lot to Solomon, especially if they're true: "I love you." People can say "I love you" and not mean it. They can say it and misuse it. A lot of people don't know how to say it. They say it so much it don't have no meaning. When you use the word "love," be careful. Somebody may be willing to accept it. Somebody's heart may be open. Somebody's mind may be open and wanting and needing love right now. Be careful how you use the word. If you don't mean it, Solomon suggests you say "I like you." If you're not sure about it, say, "I'm beginning to grow to love you." If you're not positive about it, say, "There's something about you that attracts me," but don't misuse the word love. It could be a lie in the morning, the TV is blank, the children are asleep, and nothing sexual is happening, and you can reach over and tell your baby, "I love you." Whisper it in her ear.

Now, the message I got from Solomon Burke is for every man and woman out there who's ever needed somebody to love: if you got yourself somebody, hold on to what you got and don't try to get no more. Sometimes you get what you want and you lose what you have. There's a song Solomon Burke sings, the same song Wilson Pickett sang and the Rolling Stones covered, that he believes could change the whole wide world. The name of that song is "Everybody Needs Somebody to Love." I had myself somebody. I had a beautiful wife, a couple of lovely kids, a house in the country, a car in the driveway. I had it all, but you know what? I wanted more. I went out and fell in love with somebody else. Somebody whose heart was open. Somebody whose mind was open and wanting and needing love right then. It wasn't selfish to want two people. It's just that I couldn't commit myself to either one. Any you with me? See, there are all kinds of love: sexual, sentimental, romantic, exclusive, and platonic. There's love based on fantasy, where you love someone while the fantasy's fulfilled and resent them when it's not, and there's unconditional love, where you love someone for what they are, not for what they do. One love isn't necessarily better than another, as long as you share the same goals. The problem was, they wanted my love exclusively, while I wanted them unconditionally. I went with my love anyway, and you know where it got me? Into trouble.

The trouble with loving two people, when you don't have the same goals, is that you can end up loving both. That almost happened to me. I had to choose between the two, something I couldn't do, and both ended up resenting me. My soul was divided, and when that happens, this big blank inside fills up with confusion, stress, frustration, pain, illness, and sometimes, yes, even death. I had to decide, so I thought I'd ask Solomon Burke for his advice. After all, he's been married three times, has 21 children and a fleet of Cadillacs, and is a man of God. So I called his headquarters in Beverly Hills, but his phone was disconnected. I called his number in Atlanta, Georgia, but after several days, I got no answer. Then, by chance, I ran into an old friend who had once hung out with Solomon Burke. He had been separated from his wife, and feeling sad and depressed, he too looked to Solomon Burke for wisdom and spiritual inspiration. But you know what Solomon told him? He slapped him on the back and said, "Don't worry, all you need to do is love God."

A few days later I received Solomon Burke's new album, A Change Is Gonna Come, in the mail, and while listening to it on my stereo, it occurred to me that the only way to resolve my problems was if me and the two women spent time together. So my new love came to the country. She met the wife and kids, saw the house and the car, and left the pain caused by a divided heart. Maybe she wanted to be my wife. Maybe she wanted kids, a home, and a car. Maybe it was just a fantasy, but the pain was real. I guess I made my choice, because she left and I stayed. A change had to come.

It's just like the song says: sometimes you get what you want, so be careful about what you ask for. And appreciate what you got. Now, let me hear you clap your hands. Thank you, Savannah. Thank you, Charlotte. Thank you, the Bronx, New York.

WITH ENEMIES LIKE THESE, WE NEED FRIENDS

Censorship is like the weather—everyone talks about it, but no one does anything about it.

Which is precisely what makes the fundamentalist attack on rock 'n' roll so dangerous. They're counting on no one doing anything about it.

To raise the hundreds of millions of dollars the TV pitchmen like Swaggart, Falwell, and Robertson do, they need causes. And rock 'n' roll is the perfect target.

There are some very serious problems in America today, but there is no evidence that rock causes any of them. Rock may mirror the torments of society, but it doesn't create them. Rock is not inspired by the Devil, nor condemned by God, just the charlatans who use God as an uncensored and unlimited endorsement of what is fast becoming a billion-dollar industry.

We formed MUSIC IN ACTION to stand up to this insidious enemy that wants to change the world till it suits them. Join us by simply refusing to shop at stores that censor what you can read or listen to. There are plenty more stores that let you think for yourself. And write to your congressmen and senators and demand they tell you where they stand on rock censorship. This is their election year—don't let them sit on a fence that may be dividing your personal freedoms.

Let them know you care. Or write to us, and we'll send it on.

All it will cost you is a stamp.

What will not protesting cost us?

86'D

1986—What a year! In China it was the year of the dragon, and in the United States it was the year of the Bear. And the Met. The space shuttle crashed, the Great Peace Marchers almost died in the desert and were generally ignored anyway, and anywhere from two to 28,000 people died of radiation poisoning in Chernobyl, depending on whom you read.

Humbly, we present the names, the faces, the gutter journalism that made '86 the year it was: when Buck Owens left Hee Haw, Pia Zadora performed with the London Philharmonic, an Ohio evangelist publicly burned the Mr. Ed theme song, and Max Headroom was art. It was that kind of year.

AIR FORCE, ARMY, NAVY, MICHELOB MAKE TOP ROCK VIDEOS OF '86

At this year's Cannes Film Festival, the winners of the prestigious Conard D'Or for artistic achievement in rock video were the United States Army, Navy, and Air Force, and the Michelob division of the Anheuser Busch brewing company. Anti-American protesters picketed the awards, which were shunned by many rock video directors, in protest against the million-dollar-a-minute budgets of the military's TV efforts. The Pentagon has denied reports that Michelob will be replacing the Coast Guard as the fifth branch of the US armed forces in 1987.

JOHN McENROE THREATENS TO QUIT TENNIS

John McEnroe was not quite up to his usual form, coming back from a six-month layoff from the tennis tour. After losing several matches, McEnroe threatened to leave tennis altogether and begin a new career as a rock guitarist. He is apparently no slouch on the guitar, having appeared on stage with such artists as Van Halen. Should McEnroe leave tennis behind, Sammy Hagar will replace him on the tour.

BELINDA CARLISLE LOSES 20 POUNDS

Belinda Carlisle, former lead singer of the Go-Go's, is now enjoying a successful solo career, thanks to having dropped a quantity of saturated fats reported to be in the neighborhood of 9000 grams. The fat was reportedly donated to the Karen Carpenter Memorial Fat Bank.

ZZ TOP CAR DESTROYED

The famed ZZ Top hot rod was crushed by Bigfoot during the filming of a video. The car has been replaced by the ZZ Top space shuttle, the first step in the band's program to eliminate conventional amplifiers and use Earth's atmosphere as a speaker.

IKE AND TINA ARE BACK

Ike Turner, spurred on by the enormous success of his old partner, Tina, and inspired by the reunion of Sam and Dave—Sam using an entirely different Dave this time—has decided to reform Ike and Tina with Tina Weymouth of Talking Heads.

BENEFIT FOR AMNESIA INTERNATIONAL

The latest in a long line of benefit concerts was staged this past year in an effort to help those with poor memories. Unfortunately we can't remember who played. The event was hosted by Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

CIA INVESTIGATES SUSPICIOUS NUMBER OF ENGLISH BANDS SIGNED TO AMERICAN LABELS

Beach Boys fan and former CIA director George Bush announced the CIA was in the process of investigating the "highly suspect number of English rock bands signed to American recording contracts." Mr. Bush stated he had been suspicious for some time, but it was not until hearing the Sisters of Mercy that he took action.

"We didn't mind buying up their trucking industry to bol them out," Bush stated, "but when it comes to the minds and hards of our young people, something had to be done."

10TH ANNIVERSARY OF PUNK

1986 marked the 10th anniversary of punk rock. To celebrate the occasion, Joe Strummer of the Clash and Mick Jones of Big Audio Dynamite began speaking to each other again. John Lydon celebrated by sacking his hair, changing his name back to Johnny Rotten, and taking a large sum of money from Malcolm McLaren.

GOOSE GOSSAGE APOLOGIZES TO MCDONALD'S

Pitcher Goose Gossage of the San Diego Padres, several times winner of the Rolaids Reliever of the Year award, was suspended without pay after making derogatory remarks about the club's management, owner Joan Kroc, and her company, McDonald's. Goose was reinstated after apologizing to all concerned and retracting his statement that McDonald's had "poisoned the world." Goose did not win the Rolaids Reliever award, however, after posting a McERA that was used by many lottery contestants in the "Play Four."

EINSTÜRZENDE NEUBAUTEN SET FIRE TO NEW YORK DISCO

Members of the notorious German noise band were pummeled by security guards at New York's famed Palladium after setting fire to two tons of charcoal lighter during a performance there. The Germans claimed not to know that the First Amendment does not protect the right to yell "fire" in a crowded theater. Furthermore, it was reported that the band had misled Palladium management, claiming that the finale of their act consisted merely of making enough crepes suzette to feed the audience. No crepes were found by investigators.

BOY GEORGE ARRESTED FOR HEROIN

Boy George was busted for heroin this year when his name was selected from a 30-kilogram pile of shredded copies of the New Musical Express by a blindfolded Scotland Yard officer. In an attempt to cure his addiction, Boy showed his head.

PRINCESS STEPHANIE HAS HIT RECORD, AND A NEW LINE OF BATHING SUITS

Princess Stephanie, the tempest-tossed scioness of the Royal House of Monaco, who, like her mother Grace Kelly, has enjoyed great success as a fashion model, has followed her mother's lead once again by pursuing a career in show business. Stephanie has already had hit dance records on the continent, including the smash "Je M'aime." She has promised to donate earnings from her recording career to charity. Reports that the leggy princess has hooked up with a punk band called the Dead Gnimals, however, seem to be unfounded. Instead, the Princess hopes to make a big splash with a new line of swimwear.

MADONNA CHANGES IMAGE

After thousands of home video viewers were rumored to be freeze-framing a microsecond of a Madonna performance video in which a breast momentarily popped from Mrs. Penni's brassiere, the chanteuse underwent a radical image change, donning various blouses and dresses for her appearances. Reportedly Madonna has donated the bra to Annie Lennox.

BOB DYLAN

In 1986 Bob Dylan rapped on a Kurtis Blow record, cowrote a song with Carole Bayer Sager, appeared on 20/20, and acted in a movie. He did not appear on a Schoolly-D record, cowrote a song with Marvin Hamlisch, appear on Hollywood Squares, or act in a beer commercial.

Forty-eight percent loved wearing stickers on records, and 38 percent said that they had personally been offended by a lyric. They did not mention that the lyric was from "Having My Baby." ● Heavyweight radio consultant Leonard Abrams counseled AOR programmers to play cocktail jazz and new age music, saying that the latter "reminds me of progressive rock in 1966. It will be the next big thing." No wonder we needed Jolt Cola, a soft drink with twice the caffeine and all the sugar of ordinary cola, "crack in a can." ● Natural Choice Industries, makers of Pink Panther Hot Cocoa and Marshmallows, introduced Elvis Presley "Love Me Tender" shampoo, conditioner, moisturizing lotion, and bubble bath oil. ● Yoko Ono announced plans to tour. According to her manager, Sam Hovavotz, "This is her way of thanking her fans." ● Comebacks: James Brown (his 53rd), Aerosmith, Billy Idol, Omette Coleman, Alice Cooper, the Monkees, Iggy Pop, Berlin, Isaac Hayes, the Meters, last load. ● Comebacks by lot people: Meatloaf, Emerson, Lake, and Powell, Bachman-Turner Overweight. ● Michael Jackson dolls, originally priced at $20, were reduced to $198 at New York discount stores. ● Albert Grossman, cofounder of the Newport Folk Festival and manager of Bob Dylan, Peter, Paul and Mary, and others, died of a heart attack at age 59. ● Metallica broke fresh metal into the Top 40, but lost bassist Cliff Burton when the band's tour bus ran off an icy road in Sweden on September 27th. ● Segue Signe Spunk! changed the course of contemporary rock music, but nobody is quite sure how. ● Chuck Berry turned 60. ● Barry Manilow and David Lee Roth both released Spanish-language records, adding credence to rumors that both were once members of Menudo. ● Dexter Gordon and Tom Waits became movie stars. David Lee Roth ("Crazy From the Heat") and Madonna (Shanghai Surprise) didn't. ● Run-DMC's Raising Hell went double platinum. In celebration, fans beat each other's heads in at the group's shows. ● Bob Geldof released a solo album and proved that it wasn't the Boomtown Rats that were holding him back. ● Lawrence Humphrey sued Columbia Records, Def Jam, Rush Productions, and several individuals, claiming that he was really L.L. Cool J, and that he wrote the raps on Radio. ● The forces of darkness and censorship dug in worldwide, as Radio Television Hong Kong and Commercial Radio banned Anita Mui's "Bad Girls." The lyrics to this salacious ditty translated roughly as: "He presses his body against me and kisses me on the brow, his hot breath near my ear had made me hot, making me forget where my rationality is." ● In Irantown, Ohio, evangelist Jim Brown of the Psalms 150 Ministry held a record and tape burning. Among the scorched, the Mr Ed theme song, which, according to Mr Brown, played backwards

And they say home taping is killing the music industry. ● In an unrelated PM Magazine/USA Today poll, Americans named Kenny Rogers as their favorite singer of all time. Proof that we still have a sense of humor. ● The PMRC launched its six-page newsletter, which was promptly banned from Wal-Mart stores for containing material that promoted bestiality and other unnatural practices. ● Max Dineen, author of the Penguins' "Earth Angel," died in his sleep at age 51. ● Prince bombed at the movies. ● Poco played a reunion gig, but they were outgassed on the year by Jimmy Swaggart by about $150 million, less the band's free drinks. ● Mattel Toys held auditions for a singing Barbie.

THE YEAR IN VIDEO

It's hard to say where the year began and where it ended. For us it began with David Lee Roth's "California Girls" and ended with David Lee Roth's "Crazy From the Heat." And "Just a Gigolo." That was really spectacular, too.

It was a good year for videos. There were fewer trucks than last year, and maybe more buses, because there were more tour videos this year.

There was less of an emphasis on hairdos among male performers this year. And more emphasis on women's hairdos. Nona Hendryx had some doozies. Nona was one of the hair leaders of the year. It was a kind of reestablishment of a more normal order of hair.

There were a lot of references to the White Rock girl, and a lot of fairyland videos, featuring munchkins and elves. Tom Petty probably started that trend two years ago. And there were fewer Star Trek-influenced videos. Probably the space shuffle explosion put an end to that.

There were more fashion models in videos this year. People were finally jumping on the Billy Joel-Ric Ocasek bandwagon. Also, there was less dancing and more posing. Concert shots were up this year, maybe because budgets were down. Actually, the budgets were the same, but since prices went up, they got less for it. The next step will be videos just showing the records going around and really well-dressed people sitting in nice apartments listening to them.

This was the year for the soundtrack album and video. Next year we'd like to see more videos with subtitles, so you can tell what the lyrics are, and a lot more undersea videos. That's one area that's been neglected. We're looking for Jacques Cousteau to emerge as a major video director this year. It's already rumored that he's been poking around Sean LeBaron's yacht.

VAN HALEN SIGNS DAVID CLAYTON-THOMAS AS NEW SINGER

Van Halen released their biggest album yet and embarked on an unanimously successful world tour. And all without their superstar vocalist David Lee Roth, husband of Diana Roth of the Supremes. Roth is enjoying great success himself with his new album, Sonrise Soravaye, and has been called the Julia Iglesias of Dee Sniders. Meanwhile, Van Halen surprised everyone by signing as their new singer David Clayton-Thomas, formerly of Blood, Sweat & Tears and Maxwell House Coffee, who beat out hundreds of other applicants for the spot, including Jackie Stewart, Dick Cavett, Joe Montana, and David Frost.

Only David Lee Roth knows when the year began and ended. Caught here with wife, Diana, and the Supremes (not shown).

PREDICTIONS '87

Using tarot cards, Rick Kenyon, a certified psychic in Lily Dale, New York, the oldest and longest spiritual community in America, made the following predictions. Despite his name, Rick is not lamer with rock 'n' roll and answered the questions based purely on his reading of the cards.

Will Madonna and Sean Penn make a record together?

I pick the Wheel of Fortune. Judging from this card, I believe there are already tracks set down for it, but whether it will be done in 1987—I don't think so. They are working on it—it will depend upon how it turns out. They seem to have a manager, or someone like that, who will determine whether the quality is up to standards. Currently, they're going through a difficult cycle, and I'm told that they're certainly trying to overcome it and that much of the dissension is due to adverse publicity.

Will Patti Smith be making her long-awaited comeback?

I pick the Fool card for her. That shows someone on the brink of doing something, with her eyes on the sky and not on the ground. So that shows she's not being realistic. From what I'm getting, I'd say no, although she'd like to. She's still living in the past, and things have changed, so that her connections and her style do not seem appropriate to what's going on today.

Following the lead of Dan Johnson and Philip-Michael Thomas, will Simon and Simon put out a record?

I pick the Hanged Man. That shows them upside down; they're trying to do something they haven't done, but that they can do. There is a circle around the head, which, in my opinion, shows a record that is successful. Apparently, negotiations are going on, but they aren't set now. But if they are, it seems it will be a big success.

Will Prince make another movie?

I pick the Star. That means this person is spreading himself too thin. The Star shows someone who is putting out all his creative energy on the earth and the sea, while not looking upwards toward the stars. It seems to me that this wouldn't be a good year for Prince to make a movie.

Will Jolt Cola sponsor rock 'n' roll events?

I pick the Sun, which, as a matter of fact, is a cola color. The card shows a child revealing himself. That would indicate, yes, they will, and whoever is engaged in this will get a lot of money and success. However, I feel that the cola itself will not be a success. They'll be putting a lot of money into advertising, which the soda industry can be happy about, but I suggest that whoever can make the professional connections do them quickly, because the cola will not be received too well.

Do you see more suicides among teenagers as a result of listening to heavy metal lyrics?

I pick the card of Judgment, and that card shows people coming out of many cocoons. In general, I'm being told there is an overcoming, that the people listening to this music are getting a spiritual awareness, so I see less suicides.

Will Cher have a new rock 'n' roll boyfriend?

Oh no, I pick the Devil. That does show a romantic entanglement, and it shows someone who isn't on the proper path for her. It shows someone who has her down. This person, whoever it is, will try to exploit her. It seems she's set up for that. She seems to have a life pattern of choosing the wrong people, people who aren't helping her. So from what this card shows the answer would be yes, unfortunately.

Will Ric Ocasek gain weight this year?

I pick the Empress, and the Empress is sitting in the forest enjoying herself, and if one enjoys oneself, one does put on weight. She's holding a wand, which looks like an ice cream cone, so unfortunately, that shows this issue is going to be difficult for Ric. So I would think he should be very careful if he doesn't want to put on weight.

Will John McEnroe come out with a rock record?

I pick the Tower, a sign that this is not a good idea. He just doesn't seem to have the proper sense of rhythm, which is important, I would think.

Will Jerry Lee Lewis take a new wife?

I pick the Hermit, the card of a loner. According to this card, the answer would be no. He has his lamp lit and he's looking, but he seems to be retreating into himself on awful lot. He appears to be having difficulty dealing with the rest of the world. He isn't really shaming, and he has to if he wants to attract someone.

Will James Brown get a brand new bag?

I pick the card called Temperance, and that shows someone who wants to appear as if he can walk on water, but he can't. On the other hand, water pours from cup to cup, which means the emotional situation will be good. Now, there's also a pyramid on his chest, but there isn't any luggage here, so that must mean he'll be getting rid of his old luggage.

Will Jimmy Swaggart make a pop record?

I pick the Magician. That shows someone with all the tools and the connections to do this, so I would presume, yes, he certainly will.

Do you see cocktail jazz and new age music as the next big thing?

What I pick is the Chariot card, and what I hear when picking it up is a lively kind of music, whatever that means. Now, this card shows no specific direction for these two types of music, so I don't see them taking over big. It's still a possibility. Apparently, no major record company has taken an interest in either one, which is necessary for that to happen.

Will Spin overtake Rolling Stone this coming year?

I pick Justice. That means you will get what you deserve.

"Hey, there's a guy here wants some information on Trojans"

Well, sure.

Most men would like to know more about Trojan® brand condoms.

But they're seriously afraid of suffering a spectacular and terminal attack of embarrassment right in the middle of a well-lighted drugstore.

In fact, there's no reason for this sort of panic. Most drugstores now provide a convenient self-service rack, where you'll find the whole range of Trojan condoms. (Along with noticeably unembarrassed consumers making their selections.)

But why wait till you get to the drugstore? We herewith offer information on the various different forms of Trojan available.

TO MAKE THE RIGHT CHOICE, YOU'VE GOT TO KNOW WHAT THE CHOICES ARE.

First, you should know in what ways Trojan condoms are all alike.

Every Trojan condom is a mere 0.003 of an inch thin. And ultrasensitive. (We're almost as dedicated to your pleasure as you are.)

Every Trojan condom is also highly effective in preventing pregnancy. (Did you know the condom is the most effective form of birth control available without a prescription? It's true.)

And all Trojan condoms, when you use them properly, can help reduce the risk of spreading many sexually transmitted diseases. (Your doctor can tell you more.)

So every man should probably consider using Trojan condoms. But not every man should consider the same kind. Which brings us to the different kinds available.

TROJANS: The classic, round end, unlubricated condom. Highly effective birth control, without frills.

TROJAN-ENZ: Unlubricated, with a reservoir tip.

TROJAN-ENZ LUBRICATED: The reservoir tip, plus lubrication to make everything a bit easier.

TROJAN PLUS: The feeling of a form-fitting condom, the pleasure of a special "whisper-light" lubricant, and the special look of gold color.

TROJAN RIBBED: For your partner's special pleasure, delicately textured ribs. For the pleasure of both of you, "whisper-light" lubricant, transparency, and gold color.

TROJAN NATURALUBE: Natural "jelly" type lubrication, partner-pleasuring ribs, reservoir tip, and form-fitting shape.

Okay. We've given you the descriptions. Now comes your part.

Experiment a little. Try the various kinds of Trojan condoms. That way, you'll be sure you know which is the right one for you. And knowledge is, as they say, power.

But in this case it's pleasure, too.

For all the right reasons.

of sending ideas into the country, exposing people to them. I don't think Linda Ronstadt would ever play Sun City again. I know her politics and don't think it's incompatible to put her on the record.

But again, I think this record is about, primarily, music, and only by inference about politics. It doesn't take a stance on whether Butheles should be given a voice in the leadership as opposed to Mandela, on whether Desmond Tutu can unify. It doesn't deal with those issues or the politics of South Africa, because I really am in no position to comment on them. I don't know about it enough, and my entire trip was about two weeks, and the time was spent in a recording studio. What do you think of blunt, political statements like the "Sun City" record?

I think in principle this idea of politics, which is suggestive and open-ended, can be more powerful than the newspaper headline of "Don't Play Sun City"—blunt, narrow.

There is a difference in what messages are conveyed by the different media. What you can say in an editorial on TV or in a newspaper has a different impact, a different tone, when you say it in music. They say they made it to make people aware of the situation. And it probably did make some people more aware, although it's something that's on the news every day, and if you are talking about reaching an audience that doesn't read the papers or watch the news, then I don't think they really care about it anyway. So it's not sure how effective it is. But to whatever degree it is effective, that's great. It helps. But personally, I didn't play Sun City, and I was asked to play Sun City. I turned it down. I don't know whether the Ramones saying, "We ain't gonna play Sun City" means anything, because nobody ever mixed them!

But as a symbolic gesture, it adds weight, it adds momentum to the anti-apartheid movement. I think my record also contributes to that, but in a different style. It definitely adds to the feeling we have about South Africa, to the nation toward the political situation.

Well, not necessarily. It doesn't add to the feelings Jerry Dammers, who wrote "True Nelson Mandela," has about the country. Dammers has had strong words in Britain recently about Simon's efforts. He is far from alone. Nothing obligates Simon to take a stand—except history, the history working out now in South Africa. There is precisely one song on Graceland that addresses the facts of life under apartheid: "Homeless" says: those without shelter in South Africa are tragic victims. And... that's all. This album could mean many things, or nothing, to all kinds of people—those pro- or anti-cultural boycott, yuppies with money invested in apartheid, the apathetic, the New Republic reader. Choosing to think of South Africa as predominantly a set of great musical traditions is valid in a way, but another South Africa keeps intruding: the one on fire. Who knows what will happen next Friday, next year? It's easy to believe that history will back the man's wish. No, in the long run, this isn't much of a South African record. African sounds may be the bones of Graceland, far more than salsa, say, was the key to Simon's Latinized "Late in the Evening." But this is not the Gnutman record. Simonizing the juke's rawness with 48-track production, the album is tasteful, the sound not jarring. It's not that the poems kill, the beats, but it softens them, pushes them into the background. This is a singer-songwriter's album, yells its themes as random New York encounters and not much less random love

How things like a (metaphoric) good beat and decomposing bring us together. Here's the best thing mapanga, Ladybirth Black Mambazo, Sunny Ade's great steel guitarist Dennis Adedope, the penny-whistle Morné Goldberg, and so forth, did for Paul Simon: they gave him the strength and playfulness he needed to fuckin' cheer up. At last, no more wavellets of pretty misery and sobriety and gravity and job washing over you.

Graceland's better than that. The music does have swing to it, and a goofy thing like "You Can Call Me AF" works in all the ways that the equally goofy "50 Ways to Leave Your Lover" never did. It's about a silly, beautiful pennymen's solo and salvation and the things that can connect them.

Simon has said there's a line in "Graceland" that freed him: "Loving love is like a window in your heart! Everybody sees you're blown apart, everybody sees the wind blow." Having said it, he was free. Having served on a lot of great musicians, working to make sense of a lot of varying traditions, he doesn't just say he wants grace, he shows a little of it in your face.

He's listening to the Jews and Mary Chain, the Smiths, and the Cocteau Twins. He says he wouldn't ever want to put a self-censoring sticker on a record. He's pretty down on contemporary hit radio, on the vagaries of the music industry today. "The bigger the corporation, the more pressure there is to be a mainstream act," he says. "And that act today is not very daring, it's not gonna be controversial. That's what life is. That's the truth. And you can battle, and you might win, but you will definitely have a light on your hands." Even so, he doesn't sound down about it, doesn't reflect the condemnation with a trace of the petulant lassitude that soaked One Trick Pony's ambitious a couple of years ago. This is a different guy. It's the difference one gnutman can make.

CISCO & EGBERT:
"AT THE VIDEOS"

moving images

In which Cisco confesses that he always wanted a pair of Mary Jane pumps

CISCO Hi, I'm Gene Cisco, rock video critic of the Middletown Shopping News.

EGBERT And I'm Roger Egbert of the Middletown Plain Dealer. This month At the Videos we'll be looking at videos by Berlin, Run-DMC, with Aerosmith, Glass Tiger, and Robert Palmer.

CISCO But first we're going to look at Daryl Hall in "Dreamtime."

EGBERT It looks like Spin Art, one of the art movements of the late '60s that never really made it. Various layers of working film are overlapped, creating a veritable phantasmagoria of images, both natural and, uh, CISCO Plastic. We now see that Daryl is playing guitar in a tree in a forest with his motorcycle jacket on. Now we see aerial shots of an incredible chalet—it could be just outside Rome or Paris, it could be Venice or the English countryside.

EGBERT No, that's Daryl's house in Westchester. It's right next to Reverend Moon's house.

CISCO It looks like Buckingham Palace. There's a great-looking girl inside who looks like an outlander from a Rix Ousek video. Now we see Daryl in one of the heads on MR. Rushmore.

EGBERT Your basic gargyle make-over.

CISCO Now we're back in Westchester county.

Palmer looks funny with his real bond. He's in his Armani suit, and they're all wearing Fruit of the Loom Italian T-shirts.

EGBERT We see the maze of hedges in Berlin's backyard that he had built to duplicate the one in The Shining.

CISCO Do you think that's really his house? It must cost a fortune just to heat it.

EGBERT Well, as we see here, it has fireplaces.

CISCO And no furniture. Maybe he burned it for heat.

EGBERT It's possible that the dry ice he uses to get that mist on his floors ruined all the furniture. Wow. Look how the beautiful girl is gliding across the living room. There's a hockey rink under that mist! That's the steam from the ice. This is really a multilevel video.

CISCO It's got animation, the hands of time, a garden based on the I-Ching. But keep waiting for something to happen, and nothing does.

EGBERT Yes, this video seems to be influenced by the existential French filmmaker Alain Resnais. I particularly like the lava lamp special effect on the forest of videos.

CISCO Those are cellos playing themselves.

EGBERT Autocellist!

CISCO I don't see why Hall couldn't have had John Oates in this video.

EGBERT Well, it is from his solo album, but I'll bet there is a hidden cameo appearance by John Oates in here somewhere. Maybe that's him burning in the fireplace.

CISCO Next we have Berlin in "Take My Breath Away" from the film Top Gun. It opens up in a plane wreck. The whole front of the plane has fallen off. We cut to scenes from the film. Tom Cruise making a date with Kelly McGillis. Tom Cruise on a motorcycle in a palm tree-forested environment.

EGBERT Oh wow! Now the chanteuse from Berlin is singing on top of an old F-104 out in the desert. That must be long to the National Guard. I think they're the only ones that will fly those old jalepanos.

CISCO Except for America's used-interceptor clients.

EGBERT It is a cool-looking plane, though. I think that's the plane Chuck Yeager set the altitude record in. This video actually takes place in an airplane graveyard or spare parts lot.

CISCO It looks like a good place to take a date.

EGBERT I wonder if the Navy paid for this video. You could never get into the Navy with hasekals like the boys in Berlin have. The singer's diaphanous gown is all covered with airplane grease. She must be a mechanic. I hope she doesn't work for any of the airlines I take. She's got really weird hair. It looks like blonde with blue streaks.

CISCO That's more airplane grease. EGBERT She should wear a shower cap when she works on those planes. Wow, there's a wrecked MIG!

CISCO Now Tom and the girl are having a big fight on the Santa Monica freeway.

EGBERT Now he's kissing Dolbe Gills, I mean Kelly McGillis. Now Tom's in his cockpit. You know, Gene, I find it odd, these trendy types caring about love in the Navy. Maybe it's not odd, though. I guess the Navy is defending our freedom to be loopy.

CISCO This is the No. 1 album in America.

EGBERT It is! Wow! But what about the band's being named Berlin? Is that some subtle reference to the Cold War, or what?

CISCO I think they're named after Irving Berlin. That's as American as Budweiser.

EGBERT Next we have Run-DMC.

Robert Palmer. What do the girls see in him?

with Aerosmith in "Walk This Way" it begins with two groups in a rehearsal studio, separated by a not very sound-proof wall. Each group is annoyed by the sounds coming from the next room. The wall between represents the barrier between Rhythms Radio and AOR. That's what you've got to cross over.

CISCO: It's too bad Aerosmith isn't wearing black porkpie hats and white Adidas like Run-DMC. Steven Tyler just took his malar stand and, out of incredible annoyance, broke through the symbolic wall, and now they're jamming together.

EGBERT: He really has nice teeth. But their fashion look is a little odd. They dress like Keith Richards and Jimmy Page dressed in 1970. Alghisn Thrift shop.

CISCO: It must be economical. Maybe they're wearing Led Zeppelin's hand-me-downs.

EGBERT: Run-DMC, though, has made a fashion breakthrough. They've taken the next step beyond untied shoelaces on their Adidas, no shoelaces whatsoever. Everybody will be doing it in '87.

CISCO: Now both groups are jamming on the same stage, although virtually everyone in the audience is white.

EGBERT: I must say, Joe really holds his own on the rap.

CISCO: He's the greatest Mick Jagger imitator of them all.

EGBERT: He has the biggest legs in North America. I liked that video.

CISCO: My too. I'd love to see it again.

EGBERT: Maybe later, Gene. Now we have Glass Tiger in "Don't Forget Me (When I'm Gone)." Yet another example of the concert videos we've been bashed with in recent months.

Tom Rasmussen/ABC

Is she an airplane mechanic or Berlin's chanteuse?

CISCO: This concert takes place in an interior designer's studio.

EGBERT: This is just the opposite of the heavy metal concert videos we've gotten so accustomed to.

CISCO: This is lampy, lamp.

EGBERT: Flaccid, anemic, baby-fatty, ungraceful. If you'll notice, all the people in the audience clapping over their heads are clapping out of time.

You could never get in the Navy with haircuts like the boys in Berlin have.

CISCO: The horns sound like they're made out of aluminum foil.

EGBERT: The unattractive male singer has Mary Jane pumps on.

CISCO: I wonder how he gets them on those big legs.

EGBERT: He must buy them at the drag queen store. Those are really hairy CISCOS.

CISCO: I always wanted a pair.

EGBERT: Gene, I'm shocked.

CISCO: This video is really cool.

EGBERT: You wouldn't wear them with white socks like this guy, would you?

CISCO: No. No socks.

EGBERT: No socks! Maybe I could see wearing them with some manly aryles.

CISCO: This video is really shit.

EGBERT: That's why Newton Minnow called television "a vast wasteland." Gene: Remember last month when we were commenting on how microphones get in the way of singers in videos? Well, this is one case where even a cordless make doesn't help.

In the guy's hands it looks like a bag stick. This singer should be wearing a goalie's mask.

CISCO: How did these guys get a record contract?

EGBERT: They must be from England, CISCO. Or Canada, where bands work for the government.

EGBERT: He's stripping down to his T-shirt now. He's as hairy as Julian Schnabel.

CISCO: Is he wearing eye makeup?

EGBERT: Yeah, it's blue.

CISCO: Is he wearing nail polish, too?

EGBERT: No, but he's got a little gold earring. And the bass player has an uz and jivars.

CISCO: The lead singer has Guees Who? jeans on.

EGBERT: Is that a good brand?

CISCO: No. But after a couple of hits, we may see jeans in Calvins.

EGBERT: The only really interesting fashion statement here is that the drummer has bare feet. Maybe his drum pedal has one of those Dr. Scholl's stimulator smokes painted on it. Then he could stimulate all the accupressure points in his feet with those hundreds of rubber nubs as he keeps up that deafening, monotonous beat.

CISCO: If that's so, it's the only stimulating thing about that video. Next we have Robert Palmer in "I Didn't Mean to Turn You On."

EGBERT: Isn't that an old Grateful Dead tune? I guess not. Anyway, we see Robert Palmer working out with his off-beat, Judas-like band. They're all turned out in black cocktail shirts and black opera gloves. His backup dancers are all in white cocktail shirts.

Robert is in a basic black suit, black tie, white shirt. The girls all look like Pam CISCO. Is Robert Palmer well known for turning people on, Roy?

EGBERT: I'm not really aware of that, Gene. But if the girls in his ensemble are representative of his fans, I wouldn't mind going to a Robert Palmer concert.

Frankly, though, I'm not sure what they see in him.

CISCO: Well, let's ask a girl. Hello, GIRL.

CISCO: What do you see in Robert Palmer?

GIRL: I met Robert Palmer. He came into this house I was staying at in Nassau. He was wearing a really tiny bathing suit. I thought he was an American baseball player, blond, tanned, clean cut. Then I heard this really thick, Northern English accent. It was so incongruous.

CISCO: Did it turn you on?

GIRL: No. He is sophisticated, but he's kind of bland. I guess that's what people like. I think people like serious people.

CISCO: But Rog and I like these girls because they're sexy.

EGBERT: Maybe girls like blond guys because they make them stand out.

They don't have to worry about their date outgrowing them. If the girls in this video were in a David Lee Roth video, Roth would still be the center of attention.

In this video, all you want to do is look at the girls.

GIRL: They've been trying to get those guys to go to parties to promote this record. The reason they won't do it is that they don't really look like that.

EGBERT: Well, even without makeup, how bad could these girls look? They sure look better than Robert's real band.

His look is really funny with his real band. He's there in his Aerosol suit, and they're all wearing Fruit of the Loom flannel T-shirts.

CISCO: He should stick with these girls onstage and have his band play the real instruments behind a curtain.

EGBERT: I must say, though, that as lovely as these girls look, I'd still make them take off all that lipstick before they kissed me.

GIRL: I have a girlfriend who just gave up lipstick. She's trying to do 90 days without lipstick.

EGBERT: Is she in Cosmetics Anonymous?

GIRL: It's just Lipstick Anonymous.

EGBERT: You know, I sometimes think that Robert Palmer is still in show business because of his strong resemblance to Chris Blackwell, the founder of Island Records.

CISCO: Maybe Blackwell is Robert Palmer.

EGBERT: That's an interesting theory, Gene.

CISCO: I still think that you're Robert Tepper, Rog.

EGBERT: I've heard a rumor that you're Robert Weir from the Grateful Dead, Gene.

CISCO: Well, unfortunately, we've run out of column. Rog, let's see you all again next month at the Videos.

Gene Cisco and Roger Ebert were born under the same astrological signs as Scott Cohen and Glenn O'Brien.

money for high-powered counsel like the Edward Bennett Williams offices, I'd be behind bars right now. That's why I love America. It was in Russia, I'd have wound up as a black crossball in Siberia. I was given my day in court and found innocent by my peers.

My whole defense cost me around $7 million. It went on for 10 years. The FBI, IRS, and even Interpol kept harassing me and investigating me and never convicted me of a thing. "But King's executive vice-president, Connie Harper, was convicted of tax fraud and sentenced to one year in jail."

"Connie was a victim," says King. "The sentence was totally unfair. They couldn't get me after all the money and time they spent... so they hung something on her. It was their way of getting back at me."

The FBI has had a special bond on King and has seemed determined to trap him at any cost. Finally the Bureau reached into its bag of dirty tricks and came up with its sleaziest gambit: an Al Pacino-type sting. Here's the scenario.

A shiny black Rolls enters to the curb of a posh apartment house in Manhattan. A young man steps out, slams the door with a flourish, and bottoms the jacket of his beautifully tailored suit. The doorman salutes him as he heads for the ornate entrance of the building.

This man looks like somebody, like a winner. He is president of a boxing organization called TGO Promotions, with offices at the Penta Hotel opposite Madison Square Garden. He has a partner and a secretary. His company is said to have a bankroll of about $7 million to $10 million. An Elle bank says he has several million on account for him.

But who is this guy, really? His name is Reggie Barrett. The Rolls Royce is rented and paid for by the FBI, as is his fancy apartment, his new wardrobe, his offices, and his credit cards. His secretary is an FBI employee, and his "partner," Victor Quintana, is an undercover agent.

The sting is for Barrett to infiltrate the boxing business and con King into some illegal act. Barrett has been in and out of jail. Knowing that the FBI had been on King's tail for years, he got this brilliant idea and contacted them with a plan to nail King.

The FBI must have been deaf and blind when they bought his deal. For openness, it was ludicrous pitting a small-town hustler against the street-smart King.

I knew Reggie Barrett when he was one of Muhammad Ali's numerous freeloaders. He is one of the scoundrels of the world, but a charming one. His problem has always been that he had more guts than brains. Once, in San Diego, he asked me to lend him my rental car. Said he had to drive downtown to pick up a few things. He never came back. He drove my car all the way the hell home to South Carolina.

In the end, the FBI was the victim of its own sting, conned by Barrett. He got what he wanted: He lived like a millionaire for more than a year, with all the fringe benefits. God knows how much of our money the FBI passed away on the caper. It was well over a million. Barrett later went back to jail, but it was a hell of a party while it lasted.

I had no idea who those guys were," says King. We're now back in New York, in the music room of his Unbelievable East Side town house. They said they were light promoters, and it didn't occur to me that I never heard of them. Barrett is telling me that he has this guy who is loaded and wants to get in the light business and is ripe to be taken.

"Didn't that seem strange to you?"

Not really. I have all kinds of crazy guys cross my desk with ratty deals. I listen to them for a few minutes and then get rid of them. I told Barrett we ran a successful international business and weren't interested in that kind of stuff. They kept bawling and bawling, and actually I thought they were pretty stupid. Barrett called me several times with more schemes of how we could up some lot of money. I still never dreamed that this was some kind of sting, but I kept brushing him off. Finally they just seemed to fade away." As he dismisses all of this talk about endorsements and FBI stings, King's mood brightens. Outside on the street, he's a cult figure. Cab and bus drivers bank their horns at him.

"Isn't this marvelous," King says merrily. "I love this country. I love America. Only in America could this happen for a guy like me to go from the streets to the suites."

Ken and Barbie have abandoned their Dream House for the lure of the stage—the rock 'n' roll stage. Now their names and likenesses, in the form of Dreamglow Ken and Barbie and the Rockers, are available and can be brought to life at one or with the Rockers stage. Barbie even comes with her own cassette. They have joined that plattering horde of musical couples—Sonny and Cher, Hall and Oates, Ferdinand and Isabella.

SPIN caught up with Ken and Barbie in New York. They were enjoying a little R&B before embarking on "The Barbie Rockers UK Tour."

So, isn't this a little off the beaten track? Ken and Barbie singing rock 'n' roll?

KEN: (grinning, lighting a kool) Why the hell not? I mean, what's Charlie Sexton got that I don't?

BARBIE: (laughs) You don't really want me to answer that, do you? But what brought this on? Do you have any prior performance experience?

BARBIE: Well, I've been a cheerleader for about 27 years.

How old are you now, anyway?

KEN: Actually, we don't really know.

See, we were about 18 years old when we were born.

BARBIE: That was 27 years ago. But we haven't aged.

What's happened to your Dream House?

BARBIE: It became a nightmare. So we traded it for a condo.

What kind of music do you listen to?

BARBIE: Metal Machine Music is our favorite album. Also Prince, Charlie Sexton.

KEN: The New York City came theme.

BARBIE: I thought that was Bob Dylan's hair.

What do you read?

BARBIE: Oh, Ken favors the light, inspirational trash like Brett Easton Ellis and Lashin'ament.

KEN: Barbie favors Joe Bonomo's oeuvre and Seventeen. Barbie doesn't age well.

BARBIE: (snaps) I don't age at all (anxious to change the subject). Now that we've got our hot Rockers stage, we're anxious to branch out.

to what way?

BARBIE: We'll have to have people to play there. Which means more Barbies.

KEN: (giggles) Like Hardcore Barbie, complete with hip-hop and safety pins.

BARBIE: (shouting from a look) and Rockabilly Barbie, complete with wig collection, white cowboy boots, and admiring propositions.

Barberwood?

BARBIE: Anything's possible. Also, Eurotrash Ken, with asymmetrical platinum blond hair and earrings.

Billy Idol already exists.

BARBIE: After all these years, Ken at least deserves real hair (breathes). Especially in light of everything else he lacks.

KEN: (laughing, pouring tequila) Lame, did you know "I Dig Your Wig" by the Ben Vaughn's Combo was written about Bouffant Barbie?

You don't really want to fight during this interview, do you?

KEN: Yeah, but I can't forget Kaita-Ken and Barbie.

Napst! Fantasyre beat you to it.

BARBIE: (pouting herself) a shot! Oh well. And we've got a Nerf Ken in the works. Darky glasses, highwaders, leaky pants for that pocket are extra.

KEN: Yeah, but.

What are some of your other plans?

KEN: We'd like to open Ken and Barbie's Dream Minsque Grill.

BARBIE: I'd like to make a video.

KEN: (attempting to copy up to her) People always CRIE (to the way Barbie moves). I don't think she looks any worse on stage than Bettina Carlisle.

Why does the Dreamglow Ken, with-out cassette, cost more than the Barbie Rocker with?

BARBIE: Men have always made more than women. Women get—what is it?—63 cents on every dollar a man makes.

What's all this "Dreamglow" stuff, anyway?

BARBIE: That's what comes from rising a summer home too near Thine Mile Island. Another one of Ken's stellar ideas.

KEN: (snore) Should I know what?

What?

KEN: Barbie and I have never had intercourse.

BARBIE: Ken, you're a stupid prick!

KEN: Yeah, that's the problem. I don't have one.

BARBIE: Sex, is, ah, problematic. We intend a message a ton once with one of our friends.

Which one?

KEN & BARBIE: (in unison) We can't tell you!

Midge?

KEN & BARBIE: (giggling)

Alan?

BARBIE: (floating) He had no interest in me.

KEN: Yeah, he thought I had a nice ass.

BARBIE: I'd tell my eyes if I could. But anyway, it never worked out. Nobody could bend.

Ever the party animals, Ken and Barbie head out of C86B's after an all-night beach bash. Close behind are stylists Gaili Vosty and Alexandra.

KEN: (snapped suddenly) You know what? Please shut out of C86B's.

Bed idea on his 1999 tour. Sort of. You know teaching Barbie's arms. I want to say something for Barbie. She's taken such a bad rap over all these years. Like she's an airhead. And she's not. Barbie's a tough broad.

Sift, Barbie? You mean with the original putups feet and rocky blue overhauls? With her little pink left mid-stop dress? A tough broad?

KEN: Yeah, a tough broad. We have a Briar Barbie in the works.

BARBIE: About my feet, though. That's been hell. Can you imagine wearing heels for all of your life, even in workaholics?

KEN: Though nothing's definite yet, we may be doing some commercials for motorcycles.

BARBIE: Yeah, if Jim McMahon and Sandra Bernhard can.

Your singing voice, Barbie, sounds really familiar.

BARBIE: Well (looks at Ken), what do you think? Think I can spill the beans?

KEN: What the hell.

BARBIE: My voice was dubbed in for Annette Bening in all of her beach party movies.

No!

BARBIE: Absolutely. That's me on "Rampage Process," all the way.

KEN: We're also issuing around the idea of Androgynous Barbie "Y" Ken in one.

BARBIE: Yeah, two for the price of one—the eyeliner's free.

Do you two take drugs?

BARBIE: Uh, well, we have been known to adjust our attitude a bit.

KEN: Yeah, just a bit. We've tried Ecstasy.

It must be sorta difficult for you to produce.

BARBIE: G. I. Joe used to help us. I used to date him, you know.

KEN: We can change the subject, please?

Why didn't it work out?

BARBIE: Our backgrounds were too different, and besides, he couldn't adjust to civilian life.

KEN: (laughing over Barbie) We'd also like to own our own radio station.

BARBIE: Who wouldn't?

KEN: Ignoring her, still talking to his letters could be WKEN.

BARBIE: Uh-oh, there he goes again. Cuzin Ken.

KEN: (laughing) Barbie, we could have Ken & Barbie Village. Don't the Osmonds have something like that?

Hot Rockers franchises, all over the country.

BARBIE: Tequila always does this to him.

KEN: We could be the first dolls on the next space shuttle.

BARBIE: It's times like this that really make me miss the mall shop.

THE SPIN-MICHELOB
POSTER MAGAZINE CALENDAR FOR 1987

BECK'S

April 12, 1954 "Rock Around the Clock" is not the first rock 'n' roll song, but since no one can argue which one is, it gets that distinction. It is recorded by Bill Haley and the Comets, who look more like TV game show hosts than rock 'n' roll stars. Although initially a commercial flop, it is the first rock tune to be featured in a film, Blackboard Jungle, which no doubt helps make it the first No. 1 rock song on the pop charts.

May 22, 1954 Bob Dylan's bar mitzvah is celebrated at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Abe Zimmerman of Hibbing, Minnesota. Although Hibbing doesn't have a rabbi, one mysteriously shows up just in time.

July 6, 1954 Elvis records first single, "That's All Right," originally recorded by Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup, at Sam Phillips's Sun Records in Memphis. Elvis met Phillips for the first time seven months earlier when he was an 18-year-old truck driver making a demo at Phillips's open-to-the-public recording studio.

July 23, 1955 "Maybellene," the first of Chuck Berry's many repressive records, is released on Chess. His arrest record is just as impressive: The first is for armed robbery, when he was 18; he was released from Alcatraz Intermediate Reformatory three years later. Berry's second major hit is "Roll Over Beethoven," in 1956, followed by "School Day" and "Rock and Roll Music." His second major arrest is for carrying a concealed weapon in 1958, when a .25-caliber pistol is found under the front seat of his late-model pink Cadillac outside St. Charles Mission. In 1958, Berry records "Sweet Little Sixteen" and "Johnny B. Goode." In 1979, Berry goes to jail for tax evasion.

September 9, 1956 Elvis appears on The Ed Sullivan Show, after Sullivan, earlier in the year, warned the singer would never perform on the show. Elvis will make three appearances on Sullivan—from the waist up. On April 3 and June 5, 1956, he appeared on The Milton Berle Show, earning $5,000 and the label, "the mating dance of an oborgine." On July 1, Elvis appears in a tux on The Steve Allen Show, where he sings "Hound Dog" to a real basset hound.

June 21, 1956 Sly Stone misses his first concert

May 20, 1960 Disc jockey Alan Freed, indicted for payola, pleads innocent. No doubt he is guilty, not so much of receiving bribes from record companies, as is the custom of the day, but of coining the term "rock 'n' roll," promoting it and black R&B, and not playing white covers of black hits. His live rock shows through the '50s are legendary and the ensuing riots notorious. In 1963, after pleading guilty to a lesser offense, Freed disappears from the music scene. He dies, a broken man, at age 42.

December 8, 1961 Surf music debuts when Concord Records releases "Surfer" by the Beach Boys. The idea is conceived in the back seat of the Wilson family car, where three brothers, Brian, Dennis, and Carl, are singing three-part harmony, when Dennis, the only Beach Boy to surf, turns to Brian and suggests he write a song about surfing. The kids at school would love it.

July 12, 1962 The Rolling Stones make performing debut at London's Marquee Club. The band is billed as Mick Jagger, vocals, Keith Richards and Elmo Lewis (Brian Jones), guitars, Dick Taylor, bass, Stu (Ian Stewart), piano, and Mick Avory, drums.

August 16, 1962 Pete Best leaves the Beatles at manager Brian Epstein's urging and is replaced by Ringo Starr, who makes his debut with the band two days later at the Cavern Club, Liverpool. On August 11, Ringo, at producer George Martin's urging, is replaced by session drummer Andy White, for the recording of "Love Me Do," the Beatles' first hit single.

February 2, 1963 Helen Shapiro begins British tour. The opening act is the Beatles.

January 20, 1964 Meet the Teens, Neil Young leaves Buffalo Springfield, the Beatles leave the Maharajah, the Yardbirds leave Jimmy Page, Gram Parsons leaves the Byrds, Cynthia Powell leaves John Lennon with a divorce suit, Janis Joplin leaves Big Brother and the Holding Company, Motown Records leave the songwriting team of Holland, Dozier, and Holland with a $4 million breach of contract lawsuit, Coss Elliot leaves the Mamas and the Papas, John Sebastian leaves the Lovin' Spoonful, Cream leave the stage forever, Eric Burdon leaves the Animals, and Graham Nash quits the Hollies.

April 11, 1969 The Beatles break up when Paul McCartney officially leaves the band, citing "personal differences" with John Lennon, namely Yoko Ono. Their last public appearance had been while

November 6, 1965 Fillmore West opens in San Francisco's black ghetto. The show, a benefit for the radical San Francisco Mime Troupe, is headlined by the Grateful Dead and the Jefferson Airplane. Due to police harassment, Bill Graham closes the Fillmore West, the most famous rock concert hall in the world, on June 30, 1971, three days after he closed the Fillmore East. Another important closing: Max's Kansas City (Dec. 31, 1982), an ultra-hip New York bar-lounge that made popular in the late '60s by Andy Warhol and the launching site for such bands as the Velvet Underground, the New York Dolls, Bob Marley and the Wailers, Devo, and an unknown Bruce Springsteen, who played solo acoustic guitar.

York, opens to over 400,000 people. The Grateful Dead, the Airplane, the Who, Jimi Hendrix, Janis Joplin, and Sly are but a few of the top bands in the world to perform. The event is the prototype of the large music festival and the first gathering of utopian Woodstock Nation.

October 3, 1969 Paul is dead and is replaced by an alien who looks and sings just like him.

October 5, 1969 Dianne Linkletter leaps to her death, allegedly high on acid. Her father, Art Linkletter, the most vocal critic of the rock culture, calls it murder, not suicide. The following March, Art and Dianne receive a Grammy for the Best Spoken Word Recording, for "We Love You, Call Collect."

June 9, 1972 Bruce

Springsteen signed to Columbia Records by John Hammond, the legendary exec who had signed such greats as Basia Smith, Billy Halliday, Bob Dylan, Jimi Hendrix, and Janis Joplin, among others. On October 27, 1975, "the Boss," in a spectacular coup, makes the cover of both Time and Newsweek. It's not enough, however, to get Bruce into Groceland to see his idol, Elvis Presley, whose bodyguards throw him off the grounds after he hops over the fence.

August 9, 1973 Madonna wears her first bra.

August 16, 1974 Punk is launched in America when the Ramones play their first gig at CBGB and in London on March 30, 1976, when the Sea Pinks perform at the 100 Club. Punk peaks on January 6, 1977 when EMI, the Pinks' record company, tears up their contract, three months after signing them and releasing one single, "Anarchy in the UK." Two months later, A&M Records signs the Pinks and nine days later terminates the contract.

August 16, 1977 The King is dead, from drug abuse, his body discovered by his girlfriend, Ginger Alden, in the bathroom floor of his Groceland mansion.

August 1, 1981, MTV goes on the air at 12:01 a.m. with the song "Video Killed the Radio Star" by the Buggles.

November 4, 1986 A 16-year-old Markies record makes the charts for the first time. Originally released in 1970, "Changes" was the last record the group released before dissolving and the first record ever to make the charts 16 years after its initial release.

October 18, 1986 Chuck Berry is 60 years old. Other golden oldies are James Brown, 58 (June 17, 1928), Fats Domino, 57 (May 10, 1929), Screamin' Jay Hawkins, 57 (July 18, 1929), Ray Charles, 56
